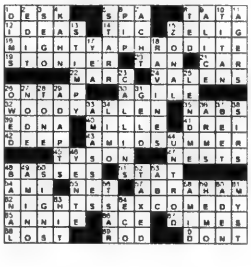
ANSWERS TO THIS WEEK'S CROSSWORD PUZZLE.



Producer/writer never too good to work in television

By LORI FIREMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In a world full of people who would love to work in the movies, Charles Lazer is proud to extol the virtues of television.

A writer/producer for the small screen, Lazer has a long career record, having written for such diverse shows as Max Glick, The Odyssey, and the Harlequin Romance Loving Evangeline, among others.

Winner of an Emmy for best writing in a comedy/drama series, Lazer is happy to continue working in a venue like TV, where "a great number of people focus on script and try to make it better," unlike the movies which he feels "have become too focused on special effects."

That's not to say he wouldn't work in film, but as both writer and co-executive producer for the current series, Nothing Too Good For A Cowboy, Lazer barely has enough time to breathe, let alone ponder the merits of branching out.

"People who don't know the business, don't know how hard it is," he says.

A typical week has him on the set between 6 a.m. and 8 a.m., and working until well past 10 p.m., dealing with issues of casting, costumes, script changes, props, viewing the dailies and planning for future episodes down the line.

Despite the demands, Lazer says, "Most of the time, I think I'm a really lucky guy," but adds, laughing, "If you have any other choice in life, take that first."

Smart advice, and something Lazer himself tried to do. He left his home in Winnipeg to study at Princeton, and later received his PhD in mathematical sociology from Michigan State. Pushing creative yearnings from high school behind him to pursue a "respectable" career, he became a professor at the University of Victoria.

At this time, Lazer was a huge movie fan, and ventured out one evening to see Day For Night. What began as a casual night of entertainment, ended with Lazer's realization that this was what he wanted to do with his life. Six months later, he quit his job and moved to Toronto to pursue his dream.

But it wasn't easy. Success as a TV scriptwriter came instantly, and then, notes Lazer, he "didn't sell anything again for four years."

Eventually, his persistence paid off. Aceording to Lazer, there was no other choice for him, that like most writers, he "acted out of the desperation that comes when you know you cannot do anything else and be happy."

Lazer glows when discussing his latest venture, Nothing Too Good For A Cowboy, based on the memoirs of B.C. cattle rancher Rich Hobson, Jr. and his life in the 1940s Canadian west. The series follows the fortunes of dashing Stanford-educated Rich, his best friend and fellow cattle rancher Panhandle (Pan), and Rich's wife, the spirited debutante, Gloria.

While the show may deal with the rather primitive Old West, Lazer is quick to point out, "This is no Little House on the Prairie. There is tremendous sexual chemistry between Rich and Gloria...and comedy that is good for 10-year-olds, but a lot of the writing would just go over their heads."

Lazer, and writer and co-producer David Barlow, originally aired the story of how the three came together last year as a TV movie, and based on the high ratings, were able to pitch it as a continuing series.

Lazer pictures writing stories about these three for years to come. "I love that these guys – one, a real cowboy, the other, a congressman's son – just decide to go to B.C. and raise cattle...and what happens with two really good friends when one falls in love and gets married to someone, who on the surface, seems so inappropriate."

As well, Lazer was thrilled to be working again with Barlow, who shares his vision for the show, and who is committed to taking casting very seriously.

Lazer couldn't be happier with the three leads. All experienced though relatively young actors – Gloria is played by Sarah Chalke (Roseanne), Yannick Bisson is Rich (High Tide), Ted Atherton (Traders) plays Pan– they possess "a natural chemistry together" that Lazer believes, in addition to the story, is what viewers will keep coming back to see.

Lazer hopes to keep Cowboy on the range for a long time, but has other things on his plate for the future, including another project with Barlow, and a happy life in Vancouver with his wife and children.

After all his success, though, Lazer says, "there's always the fear that you'll never work again. The phone will never ring. You'll never have another idea," but, he grins, "you get past all that." Presumably, to get back in the saddle and ride again.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fifth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 25. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 12, 1999. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 18, 1999.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 25, 1999. Many of the drawings submitted to us will be put on display at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

STILL THE NIGHT RETURNS TO TORONTO

Still the Night, Theresa Tova's award-winning two-women musical about Jewish partisans evading the Nazis in the forests of Poland, is set to return to Toronto in a production by Tapestry Music Theatre. It is scheduled to open in early March at the Factory Theatre Mainstage.

The new production promises to be an improved version of the play that won four Dora awards after its Theatre Passe Muraille premiere two years ago.

The script has been dramatically rewritten and new songs and music have been added. The production also has a new director, Tom Diamond, and a new set design.

Another significant change is that this production features actor Mary Ellen Mahoney in place of Tova in the central role. Liza Balkan, who won a Dora for outstanding performance reprises her strong supporting role in the new production.

Since opening in Toronto, a version of Still the Night toured Western Canada and played at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa. Lauded by feminists because it tells a story only women could have told, Still the Night is a universal story of the triumph of the human spirit.

Previews March 3, opens March 4, and continues thru March 21. $26-$16. 125 Bathurst (at Adelaide). 504-9971.

Chai Tea: The Friends of Yiddish Organization is presenting Chai Tea, an afternoon of music with composer-conductor Bill Berle and his orchestra and klezmer ensemble, performing Jewish and classical music with violinist Lance Ouellette and pianist Paul Mathew. * * *

Klezmer Tribute: Toronto klezmer group Hu-Tsa-Tsa, featuring Jonno Lightstone, Eric Stein and James Thomson will perform a tribute concert for the legendary clarinetist Dave Tarras to mark the 10th anniversary of his death.

Feb. 14 at Free Times Cafe (320 College Str.), noon and 1:30 p.m. 967-1078.

Tea Dance: Put on your dancing shoes and get ready to foxtrot, tango and swing as the Four Seasons Hotel in Toronto hosts a St. Valentine's Afternoon Tea Dance.

Chanteuse extraordinaire Aelita accompanied by the 20-piece Johnny Hood Orchestra revives the golden age of swing with the Big Band sounds of Glenn Miller and Benny Goodman. Feb. 14, from 2-6 p.m. Call 964- 0411.

Livent Fallout: Ragtime author E.L. Doctorow has filed a suit in a New York bankruptcy court in a bid to collect about $200,000 he claims is still owing on the rights to his bestselling 1975 novel.

Livent, the troubled theatre production company in the throes of bankruptcy, turned Ragtime into a successful musical. It opened at the Ford Centre of the Performing Arts in North York before going on to play on Broadway, in Los Angeles and in other American cities.

To date, the musical has brought in an estimated $8.3 million in box-office receipts.

Two years ago, Doctorow who appeared at numerous press functions to publicize the show, publicly complimented Livent co-founder Garth Drabinsky for his excellent reading and understanding of Ragtime. It is one more unfortunate side-effect of the financial collapse of Livent that Doctorow must now make court appearances to acquire his overdue royalties.

In the Spotlight: Married to a non-Jewish wife, Victor Klemperer was one of 198 Jews permitted to remain in the German city of Dresden throughout most of World War II. He kept a meticulous diary during the Hitler regime, documenting the changes he saw around him – not the big political events of the times, but the small day-to-day changes and interactions of daily life

Recently translated into English and published as I Will Bear Witness: A Diary of the Nazi Years, 1933-1941 (Random House, $41.95), Klemperer's diary is a vivid and rivetting eyewitness account of the steep deterioration of public life in Nazi Germany. For Klemperer, keeping the diary became a moral duty. For the reader, the diary is an astonishing window offering remarkable insights.

At first tolerated because of his Aryan wife, Klemperer suffered a series of escalating indignities, losing his professorship, car, phone, house, typewriter and cat (Jews were not permitted to own pets). Ultimately, he was forced to move into a Jews' House, the last stop before a concentration camp.

It became an act of heroism and defiance for him to keep up his diary. "I want to bear witness, precise witness, until the very end," he wrote. Although many observers have chronicled the "big picture" during those years, relatively few have captured the "little picture" so well.

A second volume, covering the years from 1941 to 1945, is planned for publication later this year.

Korea taps into natural resources to promote tourism

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

SEOUL — South Korea's President Kim Dae-jung is singing the praises of his country, literally, on television commercials.

The president, joined by a chorus of Korean celebrities, sings "Welcome to Korea with love."

Korea has a lot to sing about. Rich with 5,000 years of history, many North Americans only know of this far-away land through *M*A*S*H* reruns. It has never been as popular a destination as its Asian neighbors China and Japan.

Now, in much need of foreign currency, Korea is tapping into its natural resources by promoting tourism.

The 99,268 sq. km. Korean peninsula extends southward from the Asian continent. Mountains cover over 70 percent of the landscape. Divided at the 38th parallel, Korea is separated from the communist north by a demilitarized zone.

Korea has experienced a turbulent century. Following 35 years of Japanese rule, it was occupied by the Allies, and divided after World War II. North Korea invaded in 1950, and after three years war, left Korea in shambles.

American Korean War veterans revisiting the peninsula now marvel at the sight of this rebuilt country.

Korea enjoys four distinct seasons. Spring and fall's weather offers perfect touring climate and golfing conditions. The summer is hot and humid, the winters cold and dry with some rain and snow. Skiers should note there are 13 downhill resorts.

The capital, Seoul, was the seat of government as far back as the Paekche Kingdom 1, 500 years ago. The city has a lot to offer, including the Kyongbokkung Palace where many brides have their wedding photos taken. Tourists beware of warriors! Korean television shoots a weekly period saga on location at Kyongbokkung.

Other attractions are the Seoul Tower, Toksuguag Palace, next to City Hall and Ch'angdokkung Palace with its Piwon (a secret garden used by royalty.)

You can literally shop till you drop here. It'aewon District is famous for its 100 tailor shops offering custom-made suits in less than 48 hours.

At the stroke of midnight, Namdaemun Market becomes a wholesaler to retailers from across the county. If you're up for pre-dawn shopping you will find better deals than day shoppers. Items for sale include purses, ginseng teas, beauty products, clothing accessories and food items.

Even with our sagging Canadian dollar (about 865 won for $1), our money goes far.

An hour south of Seoul is the Korean Folk Village east of Suwon, chock full of artisans, entertainers and historical structures. Hundreds of Korean school children, many dressed in traditional uniforms, can be found touring the village.

Picturesque Kyongju is three hours by train southeast of Seoul. A city tour includes stops at Pulguksa (Buddhist) Temple, Tumull Park, with its collection of royal Shilla Dynasty Tombs, the Sokkurum Grotto, a UNESCO World Heritage Sight, and the Pomun Lake Resort.

Not far from Kyongju is the port city of Pusan, Korea's second largest city and home to the Chagalchi Fish Market.

From Pusan a 45-minute flight will take you to Cheju Island, a subtropical resort that natives call Chejudo, a favorite spot for Korean honeymooners. Many visit the Cheju Folk Village, the natural sculpture collection at Tamla Mok Sok Won, the Pun Jae Artpia, a bonsai park or take the Submarine Tour.

Korean Airlines flies to Seoul from Vancouver and Toronto. For more information call the Korea National Tourism Organization in Toronto at 1-800-868-7567 or 416-348-9056.

'Hockey miles' add up when three boys play

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They didn't grow up on a farm and there aren't six of them, so the hockey-playing Puterman brothers aren't likely to be mistaken for the Sutters. No, more like the Hunter brothers – but with a lot more skill.

Jason, 16, Jared, 14, and Lenny, 11, are smooth-skating brothers from Richmond Hill, each an award-winning player at the highest level of competitive hockey in their respective age groups. Jason is a left-winger with the Toronto Midget Marlies, Jared a defenceman with the peewee Vaughan Kings and Lenny a defenceman for the North York Rangers, an atom level team.

Between the three of them, hardly a day passes when there isn't a game, a practice or a tournament to get to. Lenny, the youngest, has already recorded almost as many games as Gordie Howe – more than 1,000 with 160 added to that total every year.

Loading up the family vehicles and motoring to different venues in Toronto and other parts of Southern Ontario is second nature for the boys and their parents, Allan and Cheryl. Allan has calculated that the family averages 650 hockey dates each year – that's 1.8 per day – and has racked up 130,000 kilometres on their two leased vehicles since the summer of 1997. "That's mostly hockey miles," he said.

Throw in the boys' heavy day school course load (Jason's at CHAT, Jared and Lenny at USDS Richmond Hill), piano lessons, visits to art galleries, fundraising and the regular horsing around with Nintendo and the like, and the family's schedule is one for the record books.

But, to a man (and woman), all five reject suggestions their schedules are too onerous. On the contrary, they say, "we just do it for fun."

"It's fun for everybody and we meet a lot of great people," Allan said. "It doesn't create a hardship."

For the boys, hockey is anything but onerous. It's something they took to naturally at a very young age and something they still love doing. Jason started skating at age six, the other boys at four.

By eight, Jason was playing AA minor novice hockey with the Richmond Hill Jaguars, winning a zone championship. He progressed through the ranks, meeting his current coach with the Marlies, Mike Lende, at a hockey camp when he was 13. As a peewee, he played with Richmond Hills Stars and won an Eastern AAA Alliance title. After playing as a bantam with North York Rangers, he moved up to the Marlies.

At 6 foot 1, 180 pounds, Jason's got the size and strength to play hard-nosed hockey. "I play pretty physical in the offensive end," he said. "I'm the one who digs out the puck in the corner and gets it out front to my centreman."

A powerful straight ahead skater, Jason believes "my strength is probably positional play, knowing where to be in the defensive zone and in the offensive end."

His coach agrees. "His best ability is his intelligence to make plays, be in the right place at the right time and to anticipate," said Lende, who is Jewish. "He knows where to be when he doesn't have the puck. That's what scouts look at."

Jason has already been scouted by NCAA schools and will likely be scouted even more extensively next year, when he probably will move up to Tier II Junior A hockey. Lende believes Jason is good enough to play in a major junior league, but the family has let the word get out he's more interested in a college scholarship. Major junior teams won't want to waste a draft pick on a player looking south of the border, Lende said.

Jason's got the marks and the intelligent on-ice play to make him a perfect candidate for NCAA Division I hockey – at an Ivy League school, no less, Lende said. That combination is very attractive to schools like Harvard and Princeton, which offer $200,000 (US) hockey scholarships, he added.

Lende, who is considering coaching in a German elite league next year, has seen all the Puterman boys play. "They're all good," he said. "They're all the best calibre they can be for their age group."

Jared, the peewee with Vaughan Kings, takes after his brother when it comes to positional play. "I like that you have to think about it, read the play and make the right move," he said.

As for the travel, "it's fun actually. You stay with the team, go to restaurants, stay together at nice hotels."

Like Jason, Jared is looking ahead to a U.S. college scholarship. And with his older brother, he's helping coach Lenny at USDS Richmond Hill. Jason serves as head coach, Jared his assistant who works with the defence. USDS Richmond Hill plays in a Jewish day school league that includes teams from USDS Bayview and Bathurst, Associated, Netivot and Leo Baeck.

Last year Jason played for CHAT, but this year the school team is limited to grades 9 and 10. Jared is in the same boat. While he would like nothing better than to play for USDS, there's no team for his age group.

Lenny, an atom with North York Rangers, is no different than his brothers when it comes to love of the game, even if it means playing 160 times a year.

"It's fun. I get to travel a lot. I get to make a lot of friends and meet a lot of people," he said.

On the ice, "I'm a good skater and have a pretty good shot. I play well with the team."

One of his favorite hockey memories comes from a tournament two years ago when he scored the winning goal with 10 seconds left in the playoffs to advance the team to a tournament in Detroit.

Like his brothers, Lenny's room is full of trophies and MVP awards, attesting to his skill on the ice.

Their mother Cheryl acknowledges that hockey has become the central focus of their lives, but it's not the only thing the family does.

"It just became a natural way of life," she said. "Because my husband and I really enjoy sports, it opened up a whole new life for us.

"Every day we're out with somebody. Occasionally we have a Monday night off. Often we have two or three events in one day, but we get to everything.

"I usually joke that our marriage arrangement is that I get practices, Allan gets games."

Cheryl believes hockey has been a tremendous influence on the boys. Not only has it exposed them to many different kinds of people. "I don't have, keneinehora, any of the problems that other parents have. The boys are growing up into wonderful people."

Cheryl and Allan, who both work with kids at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, sometimes plan family trips around hockey events. They'll make a tournament in Boston, in Ottawa or in small town Ontario the centrepiece of a family vacation, she said.

But does she or Allan resemble the stereotypical hockey parent that pushes the boys to do more than they want?

"I personally don't put any pressure on the boys. We do it because they enjoy it," she said.

Their schoolwork hasn't suffered, and all the hockey has helped their self-confidence. Juggling their busy schedules has helped improve their organizational abilities, she said.

Hockey brings the boys together, and during the summer the three of them will head off to the golf course to play a round together, she added.

Allan, who's a low handicap golfer, never played hockey as a boy growing up in Vancouver. Always active in sports, he excelled at baseball and basketball, so he doesn't feel the need for vicarious achievement through his sons, he said.

As he put it, "there's a natural competitiveness between the boys. They see if the oldest does something, there's no reason they can't too."

Friday Night Millennium Fever

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

It's only February, but already it seems the entire continent has been gripped by Millennium Fever. So I decided to put my two cents in, in the faint hope of putting some perspective on this whole mishegas.

As I figure it, by December most people will be too crazed to pay attention to other seemingly mundane matters, like real news or its opposite, this column.

Now, fear about the approaching millennium is anything but new. Aside from the guy on the street corner whose signboard proclaims that the world will end tomorrow, most people really don't believe the world will end in the year 2000 CE. Of course, there are a few people who claim to back this up through biblical calculations (let's call them End of the World Types, or EWTs for short).

Funny, do you notice how EWTs never quite get around to telling you exactly how this end is supposed to come about? For that, you have to buy the 14-part book subscription.

What I find truly interesting is the coincidence of the EWT, the Millennium Thing and the Y2K Bug phenomenon. If you haven't heard about this, consider yourself lucky. If we add into the equation the projected chaos emanating from worldwide computer system crashes due to the Y2K bug, the people dependent on such machines may indeed think the world has ended.

EWTs envision the end as coming about with a whole lot more fire and brimstone, or at least the kind of Armageddon that makes for really neat pyrotechnics and Hollywood movies. By comparison, computer systems failure probably seems quite tame if not downright disappointing.

But before I totally dismiss the possibility of the world ending, it's hard to argue with certain recent events. For instance, I recently saw a news piece from Israel on a Hashomer Hatzair kibbutz actually making its kitchen strictly kosher. To ardent secularists, this happening is about as likely as Gehennom freezing over.

Speaking of freezing, up here in the Great White North, we have been blessed for two years in a row with very impressive January winter storms. In 1998, the famous Ice Storm knocked out electrical power in some areas for weeks on end. People discovered that just about everything runs on electricity or computer systems powered by, you guessed it, electricity. And so, the story goes, people had to actually learn to live without.

This lesson has not gone unnoticed; in fact it seems to have brought out the raw survivalist in some people. The possibility of electrical or computer failure on the stroke of midnight 1999 in the depths of a Canadian winter has these people in a tizzy, stockpiling food and supplies, buying generators, hiding cash under the mattress, building underground bunkers, and learning obscure card games to pass the time.

Now, there's a famous saying that God provides the cure before He sends the affliction. First of all, as many have noted, if the world would only convert to the Jewish Year 5760, then the computer chachams will have another 40 years to come up with a solution.

Secondly, history has prepared the Jewish people all too well for survivalism. We're usually quite level-headed, non-sky-is-falling types, at least when it's not erev yom tov. ("Pesach is coming, Pesach is coming" I can hear the anxious housewife's cry.)

Despite the absence of pogroms and sudden eviction, we can still experience a taste of survivalism. If you don't believe me, watch the supermarket shopper hoarding for kosher l'Pesach foods, which are available in the grocery stores only while supplies last. Then again, the mad rush for challahs at the bakery erev Rosh Hashanah can be equally nerve-racking. I still have the bruised ribs to show for it.

Thirdly, we have merited as a people to be blessed with the simple solution to the Y2K bug, when airplanes won't fly and gas stations won't pump. In case you haven't looked that far ahead in your calendar, Dec. 31, 1999 just so happens to fall out on erev Shabbat.

Did Hillel the Elder have this in mind when he set down the Jewish calendar about 2,100 years ago? On Shabbat, Jan. 1, 2000, if we're where we're supposed to be, namely, in shul, there's no problem with flying, driving, etc., as long as the shul has light, heat, a backup generator, and if we're lucky, cholent for a thousand.

Just in case, I think I'll be stocking up the freezer with challahs. No wait, the freezer runs on electricity. Oh well, there's always matzah. But if the world really does end on Dec. 31, 1999, where will I get my challahs for the next Shabbat?

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

There is this girl that I really like. The only problem is that she happens to be my best friend. We've known each other our whole lives and have grown even closer. I know that my feelings for her have changed, but I don't know how she feels towards me. I'm afraid to tell her how I feel because I would never want to lose the friendship that we have now. It would be awesome if she were my girlfriend but I don't know how she feels. What should I do?

Not Just A Little Crush

Dear Not Just A Little Crush,

This situation is very common between best friends. People often look for the qualities in a boyfriend or girlfriend that are apparent in their best friends. We choose friends for a reason, and when two friends become closer, different and unique characteristics that we may not have previously noticed will become evident.

If you are really serious about your best friend, and have a hunch that she may like you too, then a good idea would be to explore the possibility of a changed relationship through a mutual friend. Try to find someone who is a close friend of both of you, and make sure it is someone you can trust. Tell the person that you are interested in your best friend and that you want him or her to plant the idea in her head to see how she reacts to it. If the reaction is good, then tell her how you feel. If not, then don't tell her. It is probably for the best.

You should be very careful what you do and say to her in this situation. Try not to make her feel awkward, because she may only pull away from you and your relationship. Try not to let your emotions get the best of you. Stay rational and try to anticipate what she is feeling and what her reactions may be.

In addition to not hurting your friendship, remember that you don't want to get hurt either. You have to be extra sensitive to how you are making her feel. Like you said, "I would never want to lose the friendship that we have now."

Good luck. We hope that whatever you decide to do works out for the best.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto.

Canada's UN vote slammed

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — National Jewish groups are using some of the strongest language in memory to condemn Canada's support for a Feb. 9 United Nations resolution that called for an international conference to discuss the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Israel advocacy groups are saying that by supporting the resolution, Canada is helping to violate the Oslo accords and is undermining its own role in the Mideast peace process.

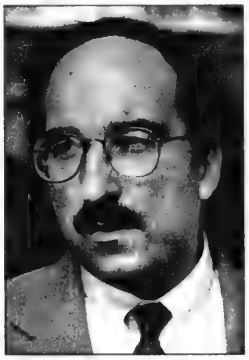
One official of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) called the motion "one more in a long litany of useless and hateful resolutions" aimed at the territories conquered by Israel in 1967.

Canada's support for the resolution is "very distressing," said CIC executive director Rob Ritter.

The UN's General Assembly, meeting in an emergency special session last Tuesday, called for an international conference to ensure that the Geneva Conventions on protecting civilians in areas still under Israeli control are respected, as is the conventions' ban on settlements.

The resolution calls for the conference to take place in Geneva on July 15.

The non-binding resolution passed by a vote of 115 to 2. Only the United States joined Israel in opposing the motion. There were five abstentions, and 36 member nations were absent for the vote.



Dore Gold, Israel's Ambassador to the UN, called the resolution a "vulgar distortion."

The Arab-sponsored resolution calls for the 188 signatories to the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention, which governs treatment of civilians in occupied lands during wartime, to meet at an unprecedented conference at the UN's Geneva office to discuss "measures to enforce the convention in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem."

Israel responded quickly by saying it would boycott any such meeting. The resolution "seeks to apply the Fourth Geneva Convention selectively in only one case: Israel," said Dore Gold, the Jewish state's ambassador to the UN.

Gold repeatedly rejected calls for the conference, calling it "a vulgar distortion of international humanitarian law for the purpose of narrow political interests," and a moot point, given that 97 percent of the Palestinian population in the West Bank and Gaza Strip now lives under Palestinian rule.

Those sentiments were echoed by Israel's ambassador to Canada. In a statement released to The CJN, David Sultan said the resolution reflects "political considerations and not humanitarian ones," and is "irrelevant to the efforts to find a peaceful solution to the conflict."

Even though Ottawa had misgivings about how the resolution was brought forward and the language it used, it voted for it anyway "because of our support for its principles," said Canada's deputy representative at the UN, Michel Duval, in a statement.

"Canada remains greatly concerned at Israeli settlement activities in East Jerusalem and elsewhere in the occupied territories. We urge Israel to stop these activities which, in Canada's view, are a violation of international law and harmful to the peace process," Duval stated in his explanation for his vote.

Canadian policy, he explained, is that the Fourth Geneva Convention, drafted following World War II, "applies to the territories occupied by Israel in 1967, including East Jerusalem. We call on Israel to accept de jure [as a matter of law]

The News in Brief

CANADA

Hearing for Alleged SS Man

OTTAWA — The Federal Court of Canada heard evidence last week about security screening procedures in the 1950s that would have prevented SS volunteers and concentration camp guards from immigrating to Canada.

William Kelly, a former RCMP liaison officer stationed in London after World War II, testified how field officers were trained to screen prospective immigrants to Canada. Justice Department lawyers contend that under the rules in place at the time, retired Windsor auto worker Michael Baumgartner, 74, would not have been admitted to Canada.

The Crown alleges Baumgartner voluntarily joined the SS in 1942 and later served in two concentration camps. Baumgartner's lawyer claims his client was forced to join the SS and that he never served in camps.

The Crown contends that membership in the SS or service in a camp were automatic grounds for inadmissability to Canada at the time Baumgartner immigrated.

They allege he lied about his wartime activities when he applied to enter Canada. Entering Canada by fraud would be grounds for the removal of Baumgartner's citizenship and deportation from Canada.

ISRAEL

Meeting Cancelled

JERUSALEM — A meeting of the Jerusalem local religious council was cancelled when nearly all its members boycotted to protest the inclusion of representatives from the Reform and Conservative movements. Council head Rabbi Yitzhak Ralbag called the session after being ordered to do so by the High Court of Justice.

Crime Up, Murder Down

JERUSALEM — Crime increased in Israel by three percent during 1998 over the previous year, with a total of 516,000 incidents reported, according to police officials. The 1998 murder rate was down by 10 percent from 1997, with 146 reported homicides.

Israel Funds Diaspora

JERUSALEM — Israel's approximately $54 billion 1999 budget includes $4 million to fund Israel-Diaspora relations. "This decision is a symbolic step in the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora," said Trade Minister Natan Sharansky. The budget's passage was secured only after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu pledged $135 million to projects supported by Orthodox legislators.

Millennium Tourist Drive

JERUSALEM — Israel's Tourism Ministry has launched its campaign to attract visitors to celebrate the millennium. A glossy full-color brochure titled "Celebrating 2000 in the Place Where It All Began" touts such events as a motorcycle rally from Rome to Jerusalem, a New Year's Eve formation of a human ring around the Dead Sea, and a "Million Tourist March" to promote world peace.

WORLD

War Crimes Trial

LONDON — Britain's first Nazi war crimes trial opened here last week. Anthony Sawoniuk, 77, is charged with the 1942 murders of four Jews in the German-occupied town of Domachevo in Belarus. Members of the jury were advised to remove themselves if they or their families "suffered as a result of the German actions against Jewish or other races or religions."

House Arrest for Priebke

ROME — Convicted Nazi war criminal Erich Priebke has been given the right to serve out the rest of his life sentence under house arrest. A Rome court cited his poor health and allowed him to leave a military prison. Priebke was convicted for his role in the 1944 massacre of 335 Romans, including about 75 Jews, at the Ardeatine Caves south of Rome. Another former SS official, Karl Haas, was granted house arrest last year after being convicted on the same charges.

Prosecution Dropped

BERN — A Swiss governmental committee has voted not to prosecute an extremist politician for calling for a Swiss boycott of Jewish and American products. The country's Jewish leaders, saying that several Jewish businesses are already suffering from the boycott, criticized the decision not to prosecute Rudolf Keller. In July, Keller called for the boycott, saying Switzerland should retaliate for being "blackmailed" by Jews and the United States over its wartime role.

Welfare Office Robbed

MOSCOW — A Jewish welfare office in central Russia was robbed this month in what Jewish leaders believe was an anti-Semitic attack. Local police, who are treating the incident as an ordinary burglary, opened an investigation into the incident at the offices of the Chasdei Yerushalayim centre, where office equipment and some money were stolen. The office gives financial support to about 1,500 poor and elderly Jews in the Volga region.

Double Nominations for Life is Beautiful

LOS ANGELES — Life Is Beautiful, the tragicomic Italian fable of a Jewish father trying to shield his son from the horrors of a concentration camp, has garnered seven Oscar nominations.

Although other films received more nominations, Life Is Beautiful captured much of the Hollywood buzz by becoming the first movie in 30 years to be nominated for both best picture and best foreign film.

Roberto Benigni, the driving force behind the movie, also received nominations for best director, best actor and best screenplay.

Steven Spielberg's graphic World War II saga, Saving Private Ryan, won 11 nominations, including best picture. Spielberg was also nominated for best director.

Nominated in the documentary feature category was The Last Days, produced by Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation. The documentary depicts the experiences of five Hungarian Jews who survive the Holocaust and then return to the sites of the former concentration camps and their native towns.

Prince of Egypt, the animated version of the life of Moses, won two nominations, one for original score.

Coroner looks into dying man's last hours

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL— The attending physician who removed a dying man's life support in spite of opposition from his family, said that consent of either the patient or relatives is not required in such situations.

The first four days of the 13-day public coroner's inquest into the causes and circumstances of Herman Krausz's death on July 13 concluded last week. This is the first time the coroner's office has held a public inquiry into a case involving life support.

Krausz's two children, George, 44, and Victor, 41, said even though they realized their 76-year-old father was dying, they had repeatedly expressed their opposition to reducing life support because any step that might hasten their father's death was against their "religious and moral beliefs."

They said they believed their father, a Holocaust survivor who regularly attended synagogue, had communicated clearly that he wanted to stay on the support.

Dr. Patricia MacMillan, who was in charge of the intensive care unit (ICU) at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), testified that she and two other physicians, Denny Laporta and ICU chief Allen Spanier, decided to begin a terminal wean to diminish gradually the amount of life support given to Krausz.

Under cross-examination by the Krausz' sons' lawyer Peter Kalichman, MacMillan said that even if the elder Krausz had clearly and continually objected to a terminal wean, she would have proceeded anyway. "Ultimately, it was not his choice."

She said she believed this was in conformity with JGH policy. After taking a break to review the policy, she referred to a section on resuscitation that states in "rare cases" when "stringent criteria" are met a terminal patient "must be apprised of the therapeutic plan, but need not be informed of all measures withheld on the grounds of futility."

To a question from Kalichman suggesting that this section did not "perfectly fit" with the Krausz case, MacMillan answered "perhaps not."

MacMillan emphasized that she had tried her best to reach a "consensus" with the family and patient. She said she tried to make Krausz as comfortable as possible.

Laporta testified that he had not tried to get the consent of Krausz, and was well aware of the sons' opposition.

He said he fully supported the decision to wean Krausz from life support. "We were prepared to accept that as a consequence death may come more quickly."

The dispute came to a climax on July 9 in a heated meeting between the sons and doctors. That night, doctors began to lower the breaths per minute the respirator was delivering to Krausz.

The weaning continued despite the sons' sending a lawyer's letter on July 10.

According to testimony Krausz died 15 hours after the respirator had been turned off completely. The cause of death was pulmonary disease, pneumonia and a fungal infection.

A Do Not Resuscitate (DNR) order had been in Krausz's file since June 22, entered by an earlier attending physician, Michel De Marchie. The doctor and the sons' testimony conflicted over whether he had informed the the DNR order.

Exactly what Krausz wanted was not easy to determine, the doctors said, but their testimony indicated that he was lucid. In fact, MacMillan described him as "remarkably alert," from the beginning of July on.

They said he could not speak because of the tube in his mouth since he entered the ICU June 14, but he could communicate through motions of his head, hands and eyes. Hungarian was his first language, but he knew English well. His hands had been tied loosely since the intubation.

His sons testified that on several occasions he had responded to direct questions by them in Hungarian indicating that he wanted to go on living and did not want the support removed, even though he understood he was dying.

Nurses records showed, according to Laporta, that "many" times Krausz had touched or bitten his tubes, and that the nasal tube had come out at least once.

From her meeting with Krausz midday July 9, MacMillan said there was "no question" in her mind that he wanted the tubes removed from his mouth and nose and understood that could hasten his death.

"He was fed up and wanted them out," she said. That interaction was witnessed and concurred by Krausz's family physician, Catherine Jarvis.

However, about one and a half hours later, after the sons had arrived at MacMillan's request, Krausz indicated by nodding his head that he did not want the support removed and wanted to go on living to questions posed by Victor in Hungarian.

The inquest will continue Feb. 22 and 23, and then will resume in April and finish in May.

Integrity, not expedience

Most of us can still recall with abject disdain the way in which, for decades after the Six Day War, the United Nations General Assembly (UNGA) became a bearpit of the nastiest invective and outright anti-Semitism directed at Israel.

The lowest of all low points was reached in November 1975 when the GA passed the infamous and outrageous resolution that equated Zionism with racism.

That resolution was ultimately repealed 16 years later with the advent of the Oslo peace process. The tide of anti-Israel bias seemed to dissipate, diminished somewhat by new bilateral relations being forged by Israel with many of its former enemies. Indeed, for two or three years, an unfamiliar optimism infected Israel's representatives at the United Nations. Their credentials were no longer being routinely challenged and they were being asked to participate in various committees.

But that sense of optimism was short-lived.

In 1995, with the change of government in Israel, the UNGA returned to being, essentially, a reflexive, knee-jerk anti-Israel forum, constantly intervening in bilateral Israeli-Palestinian problems on the side of the Palestinians whenever they asked it to.

Whether the pretext was south Lebanon or Har Choma, there are many recent examples of UNGA's one-sided, retrograde diatribes against Israel.

Last week we witnessed the latest such example. By a vote of 115-2, the UNGA called upon the 188 nations that signed the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 to convene this summer to ensure that Israel complies with its provisions regarding the protection of civilians in the West Bank and Gaza.

Dore Gold, Israel's ambassador to the UN, called the resolution "a vulgar distortion of international humanitarian law for the purpose of narrow political interests."

He understated the case.

If the signatory states do convene to judge Israel, it will mark the very first time they will have done so.

There was no such conference, nor any call for one, when for example, Iraq invaded Kuwait, Vietnam invaded Cambodia, or the former Soviet Union invaded Hungary, Czechoslovakia or Afghanistan. None of these instances of malicious aggression has burdened the conscience of the UNGA quite the way the plight of the Palestinians does.

Moreover, there is a significant legal issue as to whether the Convention protocols even apply to the West Bank and Gaza.

The rightful sovereignty of the area from 1948 to 1967 has not yet been legally settled. Only one country on earth, Great Britain, recognized Jordan's claim to the West Bank after the 1948 war. Even so, it bears remembering that Israel captured the territory while fighting a defensive war.

Finally, adding the last piece of absurdity to the morally inverted world of UNGA, virtually no Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza now live under Israeli rule. More than 95 percent live under Palestinian rule.

The resolution was nothing more than the most recent effort by the Palestinians to prejudice future negotiations over the very issue that was the subject of the hateful resolution, namely, the future of the settlements under the Oslo accords.

It is not the first time, nor will it be the last, that the Palestinians have ignored the dispute-resolution mechanism in the accords to embarrass Israel in the international arena.

As if the apparent reversion of the UNGA to the days of the automatic anti-Israel majority of the '70s and the '80s were not worry enough, Canada's active participation in the shameful campaign against Israel last week should offend all decent, fair-minded Canadians.

Canada voted for the resolution, according to Ambassador Michel Duval, "because of our support for its principles," calling "on Israel to accept de jure applicability of the Convention in the Occupied Territories, including East Jerusalem." (Our emphasis)

To mollify the sense of betrayal, Duval suggested that the use of the emergency special session was not helpful. But it was obviously not so unhelpful that it caused him to reconsider his support for the motion. His expression of regret was hollow and insincere, an insult to the truth.

If Duval truly believed the method of the resolution was "not helpful," and if he truly believed the language of the resolution "will not benefit the peace process," then why indeed did he support it?

The real reason for Canada's affirmative vote, I suspect, owes more to the fact, now that Canada has a seat on the Security Council, that Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy is determined to successfully advance his own "human security" agenda at the UN. He seems to have been quite prepared to "buy" that support. The price however, was further isolation of Israel among member states, further undermining of the Oslo process, and further injury to the advancement of peace in the middle east.

In its role on the Security Council, indeed in its role as our representatives at the United Nations, the Canadian government has a responsibility to truth, to fairness, to justice and to integrity. We are ashamed and disappointed that it opted for expediency instead.

Partition of Israel inevitable, says professor

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The partition of Israel between Jews and Palestinians is "simply an inevitability," says an Israeli professor and advisor to the government.

"It's not even a question," Dan Schueftan, a political scientist at Haifa University, told an audience at Beth Tzedec Congregation recently.

But because it has the upper hand, Israel "can dictate the terms under which the Arabs cannot destroy us," Schueftan said in a talk spiced with humor and blunt statements.

The Oslo peace accords, which he termed "unbelievably stupid and dumb," established the embryo of a Palestinian state. Schueftan said he supports the idea of concessions, but deplored what he called "foolish" and one-sided concessions granted to the Palestinians under Oslo.

Israel should never accept a Palestinians state in the true sense of a sovereign country, he said. The "overwhelming majority" of Israelis understand that their government should "impose" several conditions on Palestinians, against their will if necessary.

He said that some areas of the West Bank will remain part of Israel, including large Jewish settlements; the Palestinians must not be allowed to have an army, control over their air space, or alliances with other Arab nations; and "by far" the most important, must never be allowed the right of return, that is, the right of Palestinians expelled in 1948 and their descendants to go back to Israel. "The one thing that will destroy us is more Palestinians," Schueftan said.

"How will I know I did the right thing? The United Nations will condemn me," he said to laughter. "Even if everyone says I can't do it, I say, 'I'm doing it.'"

Israel should "reserve the right to do every nasty thing possible," including forcibly expelling Arabs currently inside Israel. "But doing it is another story." Schueftan said he would not support the expulsion of Israeli Arabs.

He cited several historical reasons for the inevitability of Palestinian statehood. For one, David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, presciently declined to capture all of the country's present-day territory, even though he could have. Because Arabs vastly outnumbered Jews at the time, "Ben-Gurion understood that if we took all the territory, [Israel] would be a Jewish state with an Arab majority. That ends either the Jewish nature of Israel or the democratic nature of Israel."

In short, there would be no Jewish state today, if Israel had captured the West Bank and Gaza in 1948. And Ben-Gurion supported the idea of partition as early as 1937, he said.

Part of the problem, he said, was the early failings of Zionism, which did not bring hordes of Jews to Palestine. Ben-Gurion knew that "one, the Jews aren't coming, and two, Arabs and Jews cannot live together."

The 1967 Six Day War resulted in misery for Palestinians, but "were it not for the misery we inflicted on Arabs, they never would have negotiated with us. Now, we get more and they get some. Life isn't fair, I'm delighted to say."

Arabs naturally settled in areas where there few or no Jews, and Jews settled in places underpopulated by Arabs. However, Israel "even today cannot digest the Arab areas. What do we do with that which we cannot digest? The question is not 'Do we partition?' but 'How do we do it?'"

Schueftan said "the best thing that can happen" is if Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat unilaterally declares an independent state on May 4, as he has said he would.

"If Arafat abrogates [the Oslo accords], beautiful. So what? Then he terminates the [peace] process, and Israel has many punitive measures" at its disposal.

Ben-Gurion remembered 25 years after his death

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Few people can rival the genius of David-Ben Gurion says his biographer, an affiliated senior fellow with the Moshe Dayan Centre at Tel Aviv University.

"People like him only come when they want to, or when someone sends them," Shabtai Teveth said at a recent lecture sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple, The Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation and Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, commemorating the 25th anniversary of Ben-Gurion's death.

Ben-Gurion's lifelong policy can be reduced to aliyah, said Teveth. "That was both the rudder and engine of his leadership. No other leader saw such a growth in Israel's Jewish population."

A second, but no lesser achievement, he said, was the founding of the Israel Defence Forces. "To amalgamate the separate militias into one military force was a mission impossible. Ben-Gurion was the one and only leader the [separate militias] were ready to accept as their leader in the War of Independence."

Throughout Ben-Gurion's career, his tenet was that for Zionism to exist, it needs the friendship and sympathy of the Jewish people, said Teveth. "If you do anything to contradict Israel, then [the country] will not exist," he said.

Ben-Gurion's second tenet, he said, was that for Israel to exist, it needs the sympathy of the three worlds. The country cannot exist without that, as well, said Teveth.

Ben-Gurion's third tenet, he said, was that Israel should contemplate an act of war only if there were no alternative. "It should wage no political wars."

Ben-Gurion was the only political leader who saw that a Jewish state was possible only under partition. "As secretary of Histadrut, Ben-Gurion preached the separation of Jewish and Arab economy.

"Had it not been for the victims of the Arab riots from 1936-39, we should have sent [the Arabs a big gift. Those riots] helped entrench a division of the economy."

Asked what Ben-Gurion's message would be to the youth of today, Teveth said it would be to study Hebrew. "The things that keep the Jewish people together are Hebrew and religion.

"Zionism offers youth the opportunity to prove themselves in many ways. Ben-Gurion would tell youth to come to Israel, and study Hebrew."

It's nice in Nice for Conservative rabbinical students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The French Riviera and the Jewish Theological Seminary – New York training ground for Conservative rabbis – wouldn't be likely partners on a word association test, but for the small Masorti (Conservative) community in Nice, France, two rabbinical students, who used to call Canada home, are bridging the gap.

"It's obviously kind of an exotic experience," said Jennifer Tobenstein, a native of Montreal who visits Nice as a rabbinic intern for one weekend every other month, alternating with Ayelet Cohen, who learned French as an adolescent in Montreal.

Torontonian Aubrey Glazer is a rabbinic intern in Paris. He commutes from New York one weekend a month.

The trio, all of whom learned French as a second language, comprise part of a group of rabbinical students who participate in the novel program of the World Council of Synagogues (the international body of Conservative congregations). Two congregations in England, one in London and one in Leeds, are also involved.

The French participants are "tremendously hungry for an intellectually open environment where they can sit with their spouses and ask questions," said Rabbi Charles Simon, New York-based executive director of the Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs, who spearheaded the program as an executive member of the World Council.

Some French Jews have travelled to Paris from other cities to study with the country's only Conservative rabbi after hearing him on the radio, Rabbi Simon noted.

Tobenstein, 26, who is in her fourth (second-last) year of the JTS rabbinical program, said the congregation in Nice is warm and friendly.

Unlike most North American Conservative communities, the Nice congregation is largely Sephardi, with Moroccan, Algerian and Tunisian backgrounds. Of the city's 30,000 Jews, only about 5,000 affiliate with a congregation, said Tobenstein. There are several Orthodox synagogues and one Liberal one.

The new congregation evolved out of a lay-led Rosh Chodesh group. There are now about 50 members, but it is constantly growing, said Tobenstein. In January, they moved to a new location in two adjoining storefronts. Services were previously held in a hotel seminar room.

"There wasn't that strong sense of sacred space, which hopefully now they'll be able to develop," said Tobenstein.

In addition to leading Shabbat and holiday services and teaching, Tobenstein and Cohen are helping the newly formed ritual committee forge a synthesis of existing Sephardi and Ashkenazi customs.

They also do much work with youth. Both worked with NOAM, the Masorti scouting/youth movement, last summer – Tobenstein in France and Cohen in England. Tobenstein set up a youth program on her initial visit for the High Holy Days. Upcoming events include a Purim play, a bar mitzvah and a bat mitzvah.

"It's really exhausting and really energizing at the same time," said second-year-student Cohen, 24, adding that the Nice congregation hungers for knowledge of Jewish texts and traditions.

Some of the locals have found the traditional egalitarian services, led by Tobenstein or Cohen, somewhat unusual.

Aubrey Glazer is a rabbinic intern at a Paris synagogue.

But "the more people peek in, the more the mystery is broken," Tobenstein said. "They see it's not as radical as they would have thought."

Twenty-eight-year-old Glazer – a fourth-year rabbinical student whose eclectic background includes undergraduate French language and literature studies as well as film-making experience – is doing his internship at Adath Chalom congregation in Paris.

The "very vibrant congregation" of between 200 and 300 members moved at the beginning of February from a three-room apartment in the 16th arrondissement to a much larger storefront nearby. Their rabbi, Rivon Krygier, is a graduate of the Masorti seminary in Jerusalem.

Glazer's role, on his monthly weekend visits, includes teaching youth group counsellors, leading adult study groups on Shabbat, and giving sermons. He also leads havdalah services and a class across town in the eastern part of Paris with a small satellite group.

Masorti represents a modern but halachically and intellectually rigorous approach to Judaism, explained Glazer.

The 10-year-old congregation in Paris is egalitarian but more traditional in terms of outlook and attire than its counterpart in Nice, according to Glazer. It is also warm and welcoming, he said.

One tradition that impressed him is Rabbi Krygier's weekly aliyah, for which the entire congregation stands.

The effect on the students has been transformative, according to a JTS news release. Cohen stressed that, as her first pulpit experience, the program has served as an invaluable reminder of why she chose to enter the rabbinate, "something you can lose sight of during school."

Jews must anticipate Messiah's coming: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Contrary to what many think, prophecy was not restricted to those in ancient times, according to Rabbi Immanuel Schochet, professor of philosophy at Humber College.

Rabbi Schochet was giving the first in a lecture series on the Messianic era sponsored by the Jewish Russian Community Centre. The lecture was held at B'nai Torah Congregation.

The fact that prophesies come through the holy spirit, as opposed to dreams, voices or sounds, as was the case in ancient times, doesn't make them less valid, the rabbi said.

The most talked about prophecy today is probably about the coming of the Messiah, which has been foretold throughout Jewish history. "If we don't look forward to his coming, we are denying the prophets, as well as Moshe Rabbeinu and the Chumash," Rabbi Schochet said.

"Jews look forward and anticipate [his coming] every day, the whole day, even if he tarries. That is a fundamental of Judaism."

The fact that the Messiah has not come yet, he said, should not be the cause of losing faith in the prophesy, but rather should increase it. "It is not one more day of his non-coming, but one day closer to the day when he will come."

The present generation is more worthy of seeing the redemption than past ones have been, he said, because it is building on the mitzvot performed by Jews in past times.

The whole world doesn't have to change in order for the Messiah to come, the rabbi said. "Even a tiny action may be what is needed."

Then, he said, "every one of us will be a prophet, who will use that power for divine inspiration, and to understand the deeper profundities of the world."

The Messiah himself will be a teacher of Torah, Rabbi Schochet said. "All the Torah we have ever learned will be like nothing compared to the mystical dimension he will teach, not only us, but Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Moshe, as well."

In spite of Rabbi Schochet's intention to give a general theological approach to the subject of prophecy and the Messiah, members of the audience were quick to demand specifics.

How do we know the redemption won't come for another 1,000 years, one person asked. "We don't have to know the exact date of his arrival; we just have to have faith," the rabbi replied.

Can he be someone already dead, asked another. Yes, was the answer, with the explanation that he would have the characteristics of the dead person, rather than being the exact same person.

Nevertheless, the rabbi said, obsessive speculation on the identity of the Messiah and on when he will come is "an exercise in futility that serves no practical purpose."

When asked straight out if he believed that the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, is the Messiah, Rabbi Schochet answered promptly: "When he was alive, I did. Now I am not so sure."

(Rabbi Schochet was a signatory to a notice by mainstream Lubavitch rabbis decrying the movement to proclaim Rabbi Schneerson as the Messiah.)

We can't proclaim someone as the actual Messiah until certain actions have taken place, such as the rebuilding of the Temple, and the ingathering of the exiles, he said.

There will be the resurrection of several prominent people, including those who can teach how to rebuild the Temple and how to perform the sacrifices. Also resurrected will be those holy people who "really suffered in golus (the Diaspora), and truly mourned for Jerusalem," he added.

The fact that there will be no more war or strife won't be "so that you can party," Rabbi Schochet said. "It will be so that there will be no distractions to stop you from understanding HaShem."

In reply to another question, he said that there will be no difference if you are in Canada or in Israel when the Messiah comes, "so long as you are where you are supposed to be, and are doing what you are supposed to be doing."

Canadian complicity

Last week, during an "emergency special session" of the United Nations General Assembly (GA), Canada voted to support a resolution calling for the signatories to the Fourth Geneva Convention to meet in Switzerland to examine Israel's settlements policy and its treatment of the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. The special session was convened at the behest of Yasser Arafat and the PNC. The final vote was 115 in favor; two opposed (Israel and the United States); five abstentions; and 36 absent. (See related stories on page 1 and 4.)

The convention was enshrined in 1949 as a result of the racist and genocidal policies of the Nazis. It was an addition to the original Geneva Conventions of 1864, which were the first international effort to codify rules for the humane treatment of civilians and military personnel in times of war.

Set aside the question of whether the Geneva Convention protocols even apply to the situation in the West Bank and Gaza. Set aside, too, the fact that more than 95 percent of the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza live under Palestinian and not Israeli rule. The PNC-sponsored resolution was a transparent attempt to demonize Israel, to try, once again, to cast it as a lawless pariah within the community of law-abiding states. It was a transparent attempt by the Palestinians to circumvent the Oslo process in resolving its disputes with Israel. It was also, therefore, a flagrant, egregious affront to the letter and the spirit of Oslo.

Ambassador Michel Duval attempted to soften the sting into Israel's jugular of Canada's outrageous vote by expressing "regret" at the GA's resort to the emergency session vehicle and to the inclusion of language that was "complicated" and that "will not benefit the peace process." But his regret was nothing more than false remorse, serving only to prove Canada's position to be foolish, inconsistent, hypocritical and illogical, all at the same time.

That Canada was complicit in the attempt to demonize Israel and in the wholesale disregard for and violation of the Oslo accords, is breathtaking. To have supported a patently partisan, political ploy aimed so obviously and cynically at harming Israel and that totally flouts basic Canadian norms of fairness, truth and balance, is a disgrace to the values that we hold so precious.

We condemn the government for its shameful complicity.

For the sake of heaven

More than 250,000 demonstrators, almost all of them Haredim, gathered on the streets of Jerusalem last Sunday to protest against the Supreme Court. They were inveighing against what they regard as the unwarranted incursion of secular authority, as embodied by the Court, into their religious world. But there is no hermetic seal to their religious world. The issues of routine life in the religious world naturally spill over and touch every aspect of routine life in the non-religious world too.

As Israel's society is becoming more complex, so too are the issues coming before the Supreme Court. The overlap between the two worlds, religious and non-religious, was inevitable. But was the unfolding conflict between the two worlds also inevitable? We believe not.

Fifty years after its founding, the character of the young country is evolving, trying to find its own unique shape, and trying to determine the extent of accommodation, if any, between the need by the haredi minority to live by theocratic doctrines with the need of the non-religious majority to live by democratic ones.

We hope and pray, for the sake of the country and for the sake of heaven, that the changes in Israeli society unfold under a canopy of wise leadership that abjures extremist, hatred-laden language and embraces instead the language and the ways of peace.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

Need national Holocaust museum in Ottawa

If Jean Chrétien's visit to Auschwitz expedites the building of Canada's Holocaust Museum, then the trip will have been exceptionally worthwhile. As Holocaust survivors die off, it is important that there be a tangible memorial to the victims of the atrocities perpetrated by the Nazis so that it will serve as an important historical reminder, with the hope that, perhaps, such an event must never be permitted to happen again.

It is regrettable that while Mr. Chrétien was a member of Pierre Trudeau's government, this trip was not made. It might have moved Mr. Trudeau and his cabinet to pass enabling legislation to prosecute Nazi war criminals who found their way into Canada after World War II. That would have given the process at least a ten year jump start over the laws enacted by the Conservatives under Brian Mulroney and many, many more Nazis would have been brought to justice.

Dearth of campus services for Jewish students

I was very intrigued to read (CJN, Jan. 21) that Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, director, Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation said: "Toronto is giving more than double to support Jewish education [compared with] most other Jewish communities in North America."

This support may be true for Jewish education in the elementary and high school grades (and I have a daughter in each stage) but it falls miserably short when we start to look at the post-secondary stage of education, and here I mean the commitment to Jewish life on the Toronto campuses.

This is the reason why we are delighted that UJA Federation has, for the first time in 50 years, committed to help us raise $2 million dollars to build Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto and renovate the York University campus site. This commitment will allow us to engage students at this most critical stage of their development and continue their Jewish education which should not stop at high school.

We would also like the community in its future planning to consider the plight of those 13,000 children (as noted by Rabbi Unterman) who are not getting any Jewish education at all. It may very well be, that the first time on campus that they are asked to participate in a Jewish event will be the first time that they are exposed to Judaism other than life cycle events. We must find a way to reach those children in their last years of high school so that we can welcome them with open arms when they do get to University.

Reform and Conservative have no clout in Israel

I am surprised that in its letter, ARZA CANADA could make such poor arguments regarding the recent Religious Council Bills brought forward in the Israeli Knesset. (CJN, Jan. 28)

To suggest that the bill violates the integrity of the municipalities and regions is false. The reality is that besides a handful of Israelis and some American Jews, Reform and Conservative do not have a presence in Israel besides a political lobby and some big buildings paid for by American Jews. From a Democratic representational perspective of the population, Reform and Conservative have no business having any representation on the religious councils. Who will they be representing? American Jews living in America? It's time Reform and Conservative stop trying to impose themselves in the name of democracy. Isn't it ironic that their only ally in Israel is the secular Supreme Court.

Their threat of Israel losing support from an overwhelming majority of Jews in the Diaspora holds very little weight. As ARZA stated themselves, they represent 6,000 out of 200,000 Jews in Canada. Diaspora Jews need Israel a lot more than Israel needs them. Maybe they should be directing their energies here in North America, so as to stop the 50 percent intermarriage rate so they can at least try to hold on to whatever members they do have. Their so-called Judaic practices that they are fighting for in Israel don't seem to be finding much adherence and loyalty here in America.

Two Canadians eligible for Austrian compensation

In connection with their pending applications to the Austrian National Fund for the victims of national socialism, the following names have been given to the Austrian Embassy: Norbert Abrams, 3 Brewside Ave., Toronto, Ont. M5P 2T9 and Uriel George Luft, born Aug. 24, 1933, 520 Milton St., #3, Montreal, Que. H2X 1W4.

Unfortunately the contact between the National Fund and the two persons was terminated, probably because they have moved. Since they are regarded as probable recipients of payments by the fund, Mrs. Abrams and Mr. Luft or anybody who is in the position to establish a contact with them is invited to contact the Austrian Embassy at 445 Wilbrod St., Ottawa, Ont. K1N 6M7, tel. 613-789-1444.

An Ashkenaz in Sepharad

By MANUEL PRUTSCHI

My wife, infant son and I were in Spain in the mid-70s, literally in the dying days of the Franco regime. I was researching 18th-century Spanish-Caribbean society at the Inquisition Archives in Madrid. This made it possible for us to connect with the Jewish community, which hailed mainly from Morocco.

Praying at Madrid's one synagogue was my first exposure to the Moroccan-Sephardi rite. The entire service is said out loud. Congregants recite individual portions, so that at all times, prayer comes to one from different sections of the sanctuary. The congregational portion is interspersed with chants by the chazzan, and there is a lot of singing in unison. Everyone present participates and experiences the totality of the service. Everyone, as a mystic would put it, is "in the same rhythm" achieving a collective "we."

Sephardim perform birkat kohanim everyday. While the kohanim chant from the mizrach (east), fathers place their hands, wrapped in their prayer shawls, upon the heads of their sons, and bless them in turn. The relationship between the younger generation and their elders is manifested visibly in the synagogue.

After a man has been called up to the Torah, his sons, nephews, and other relatives, approach the bimah (tebah) and show their respect and love by kissing the one who has been honored with the aliyah.

It is at the Madrid synagogue as well, where I first came to know the Sephardi custom that when two individuals shake hands, each then takes his fingers to his lips in the gesture of a kiss. What a wonderful way of giving tangible expression to the preciousness of the exchange! Remember as well, that Sephardim, men and women, kiss not on one, but on both cheeks.

The history of Spain's Jewish community stretches back 2,000 years.

The very word Sepharad in Hebrew means Spain. Jews were settled in the western-most Mediterranean while the Second Temple still stood in Jerusalem.

Jewish Berber tribesmen already had been living in North Africa at the time of the original Muslim conquest of Spain, in the eighth century. The conquest would continue for centuries.

Life for Jews on the Iberian peninsula was a roller-coaster ride, oscillating between toleration and persecution, but particularly in the periods of harmony, there were golden ages for the Spanish Jewish community both under Muslim and Christian rule. Sephardim felt equally at home communicating in the holy tongues of Hebrew and Aramaic and the vernaculars of Greek, Spanish and Arabic. Many are the examples of Sephardim uniting in one person the multi-faceted qualities of pious rabbi and philosopher, fervent believer and famous financier, minister to the faithful and merchant of goods, religious scholar and scientist, mystical psalmist and worldly poet, fisher of souls and physician to the body, servant of God and civil servant of the state. Sephardim thus were best positioned to be the facilitators of a unique intercultural exchange among Christians, Muslims and Jews as well as to make a monumental contribution to Judaism.

Jews and those conversos (converts to Christianity) who maintained a secret loyalty to Judaism with the advent of the Inquisition and the implementation of the expulsion, would be dispersed to all points of the compass. They built significant communities throughout the world, particularly in Italy, the Netherlands, the possessions of the Ottoman Empire (covering the Middle East and central and eastern Mediterranean Europe) and even the Americas.

It was in Turkey where the lingua franca of Sephardim – Ladino – was to emerge and flourish. It is a form of Medieval Castilian Spanish, written in Hebrew characters. Ladino is to Sephardim what Yiddish is to Ashkenazim.

The synagogue in Toledo, Spain.

Rabbi Yaakov Culi authored in Ladino the multi-volume MeAm Lo'ez, the great encyclopedic 18th- century popular biblical commentary, first published in Constantinople. It has since been translated into Hebrew, English and other languages.

Our stay in Spain was memorable. It tangibly connected us with a magnificent Jewish past. It also introduced us to a contemporary Moroccan Spanish Jewish community whose members were the inheritors of that rich Sephardi heritage from the Iberian Peninsula and North Africa. We were able to study Sephardi history and culture, not only from paper documents, but also from people – living documents, as it were. We visited the Jewish quarters. We walked through synagogues whose buildings still stand, and we were moved by what they represented and by the uniqueness of their architecture.

The synagogue in Cordoba, Spain.

Who would have thought that over 20 years later, destiny would find me working in Toronto's magnificent new Sephardic Kehila Centre (SKC)? A part of that very community that we encountered two decades before in Spain, built the centre.

The building's architecture reflects the very sites we had visited. The sanctuary is built in the Moorish style. The lobby, with its arches and the Aron Kodesh (Hechal), with added North African motifs, transports us back to the synagogues of Cordoba and Toledo in Spanish Castile.

There are holy men in Moroccan Jewry who are akin to chassidic rabbis. They are known as mekubalim, that is cabalists. They are miracle workers who cure the sick and make the childless woman fertile. I had the profound privilege in 1997 to spend a Shabbat with one of them – Rabbi Refael Abuhatzira – at his home in Israel's coastal city of Ashdod. The rabbi inaugurated the synagogue at the SKC's opening. The congregation was named Abir Yaakob after the rabbi's ancestor, the sainted "mighty" Rabbi Yaakob Abuhatzira, the grandfather of the Baba Sali. His portrait graces my office. Rabbi Refael speaks Hebrew, French and, you will never guess, Yiddish.

Until relatively recently, there have been no authentic Sephardi yeshivot except for the outstanding yeshiva of Porat Yosef in Jerusalem. Many Sephardi rabbis, therefore, trained in eastern European-type academies. Not surprisingly, as a result, they speak Yiddish. On the other hand, I have yet to meet an Ashkenazi rabbi who speaks Ladino.

My stay with the rabbi in Ashdod was one of the most moving, humbling and memorable experiences of my life. It began with me being among those honored to complete the writing of a new Sefer Torah, all in silver, which the rabbi donated to Abir Yaakob. My friend and I specifically were invited to stay with the rabbi at his home. I have this quirk that I always prefer to stay in hotels. So a bit before Shabbat, we left for a hotel on the city's coast. Our intention was to walk back and forth between the hotel and the rabbi's house throughout Shabbat. As my friend was registering us at the hotel, which looked as if it had seen better days, I stayed outside looking after the car.

Unexpectedly, a fellow walked out of the hotel and in perfect English, asked me where we were from. – "Canada" I replied – "Me too" he said. He then proceeded to warn me that under no circumstances should we stay at the hotel – it was a fleabag. I quickly got my friend out, and we raced back to the rabbi's home, making it just before Shabbat.

We were greeted by one of the other guests who very nonchalantly told us – "Oh, you're here. The rabbi told us you'd be back."

We were left to wonder who was the mysterious Canadian, of all coincidences, who saved us from what would have been a dreadful Shabbat. My friend and I certainly had no doubt. He was a messenger that Hashem had sent on behalf of the rabbi.

Shabbat dinner was a feast of many courses, with the rabbi passing each of us the food from his own hand. It started with us consuming separate varieties of vegetables, so that one could make the pertinent brachah for each. The opening of the meal therefore, was replete with blessing. I also imbibed a substantial amount of spirits, and miraculously, woke up the next morning without even the slightest trace of a hangover. Among the Moroccan community, there is a real sense of food being sacred, and eating and drinking are sacred acts. Moroccan Jews eat with simchah, with true joy, and HaKaddosh Baruch Hu is definitely present as a guest at the table.

I thought Ashkenazim had a penchant for food, but we do not even come close to Sephardim. They truly integrate earth and spirit, taking an absolute delight in food, its quality, its tastiness and the sheer pleasure of eating it in the company of one's fellow Jews. It is one of the treasures of the culture.

There is an old Ladino saying, Cada uno sabe su salmo, ma el chazan sabe dos, Each one knows just his own psalm, but the chazzan knows both. Its lesson for us, is that there be mutual understanding between Ashkenazim and Sephardim and appreciation of their respective heritages. For the good of the Jewish people, we must not know only our single psalm, but be like the chazzan, know and respect both.

Opinions

February blues banned in Israel

You can't say I don't think of the well-being of my readers. That's why I've decided to spare you yet another take on Israel's political situation ahead of the elections in May, as seen now almost every day in the media.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

I pledge that the following 700 words, though written by a journalist in Jerusalem, will be free of political content and electoral punditry. Such coverage can wait for upcoming columns, as the election is still three months off. After all, this is a tough enough time of year for all of you in Canada, given the insidious forces now preying on you, forces known to few Israelis.

For all the westernization of Israeli life, differences between Canada and the Jewish homeland still far outnumber similarities. February is one of them. This is the month when Israelis savor the early signs of spring, while Canadians, already reeling from months of bone-chilling winds and treacherous icy roads, ask themselves if winter will ever end.

February suffers from an image problem in Canada, like that of a recurring disease for which there is no permanent cure. In the Great White North, February is the bête noire of the calendar, the doomsday month of Canadian reality. This much-dreaded month is considerably friendlier in Israel. If Israelis have to wrestle with afflictions galore, the February blues are mercifully not one of them.

It may no longer be true, but in my previous life in Toronto, newspapers would dredge up statistics year after year showing that this is when the mental health of Canadians takes a dive as more of them commit suicide in February than in any other month. The collective venting of February angst seemed itself a ritualistic part of the seasonal routine.

The worst of winter may now be over for another year, but most Canadians, even those in big cities, are still hunkering down, under siege from the scourge of nature. Hibernation or an extended stay in Florida are out of the question for most people. Israel never looked so good.

In an apparent betrayal of my Canadian heritage, or a tell-tale sign of impending middle age, I now rejoice in the mostly frost-free, snowless winters in Israel. It is now 20 years since I last lived through a Canadian winter. And apart from hockey, I can't say I miss it. I'm also not allowed to forget it, as winter is what I'm most asked about after telling people where I grew up.

It's one of the few quintessential defining aspects of being Canadian wherever you live. As the venerated Quebec singer Gilles Vignault put it, "Mon pays, c'est l'hiver." Indeed, for Israelis, as with most foreigners, nothing seems to identify Canada as much as its winters. And nothing seems to define Israel less than its winters.

Winter in the Middle East is more like early autumn in Canada but without the flaming-colored leaves. Admittedly, in Israel there is little of the romance associated with winter in so many parts of the world. But at the same time, we're spared the natural calamities – blizzards, ice storms, freezing temperatures, tornadoes, hurricanes and the like – that occur in other countries during the winter.

Reports of such climatic excesses often appear on local newscasts, fascinating Israelis, who are safe in the knowledge such things don't happen here.

Israeli children gush with envy at images of metre-high snowdrifts in far-off places like Canada. My kids relish tales I recount to them of childhood winters spent in Toronto. The stories only feed their fantasies for a taste of Canadian winter in Israel. For them, nothing could score higher on the fun-o-meter than a snowfall, which happens at best only once or twice a year in Jerusalem and virtually never in Tel Aviv.

The mere forecast of possible flurries in Jerusalem sends most kids into a euphoric tizzy of anticipation and throws the entire city into a frenzy. At first sighting of the white stuff falling from the sky, even if by Canadian standards it's only a nebishy little snowfall, life in the capital grinds to a halt – and Jerusalem temporarily lives up to its name as a city of peace.

That's the rare exception. So far this winter, snow has been as absent from Jerusalem as polite political debate. On most days, meteorologists correctly predict relatively mild temperatures, clear to partly cloudy skies and occasional rain showers. Not exactly the conditions from which a snowstorm takes shape. Nor the February blues.

Now, about those political ill-winds blowing on the election campaign…

A new era of uncertainty

The death of King Hussein has left a gaping hole in the fabric of the Middle East. Hussein ruled Jordan for over 40 years, bringing a modicum of stability to its citizens and to its neighbors, including Israel.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Hussein's record was not perfect – his mistakes included joining Egypt and Syria in the 1967 war, allowing the Palestinians to use Jordan as a base for terror, and bowing to pressure to support Iraq in 1990 – but overall, he had a very positive influence.

Long before the formal peace treaty was signed with Israel in 1994, Hussein took many steps towards cooperation between Jerusalem and Amman.

In secret meetings, Jordanian and Israeli leaders developed practical cooperation in a number of sensitive areas, including measures to stop Palestinian terrorism, and the peaceful division of scarce water resources.

In contrast to the rejectionism of most Arab leaders at the time, Hussein recognized that such policies mainly hurt the Arabs themselves. In 1973, Hussein came to Israel to warn Golda Meir of the impending Egyptian and Syrian attacks. More recently, Hussein helped to lower tensions between Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

However, the intense intrigues that accompanied Hussein's last weeks highlighted the continued potential for instability in Jordan. Hussein's brother, Hassan, had been crown prince for decades, and in the past few years, developed a close working relationship with many leaders, including Israelis. Suddenly, Hassan was replaced by Hussein's oldest son, Abdullah, and everything changed.

King Hussein is deeply mourned in Israel, and it will take his successor many years to develop a similar level of respect. Abdullah's experience as a senior army officer in charge of special forces has prepared him to deal with the military threats to Jordan, but he will also be tested politically. Unlike the children of rulers in many other Arab countries, Abdullah was never a playboy, and has not used his position to enrich himself. Rather, the new king has played a serious, if low-profile role in Jordan, but many questions remain. The major uncertainty is whether Abdullah can continue his father's careful balancing act.

The uncertainties of political transition affecting the basic interests of millions of people throughout the region, go beyond the particular case of Jordan. None of Israel's neighbors have developed stable processes to transfer power.

In Syria, President Hafez al-Assad, in his 70s, began grooming his second son, Bashar, to take over, after Assad's first son died in a car accident. At the same time, Assad's brother Rifat, who tried to take power many years ago, may seek to stop Bashar. In addition, a number of top Syrian officials and military officers may also attempt to take power following Assad's death, perhaps returning Damascus to the pattern of coups and counter-coups that existed in the 1950s and '60s. The only certainty about Syrian succession is uncertainty.

In Egypt, the assassination of President Anwar al-Sadat in 1981 was followed by a smooth transition of power to then-vice-president Hosni Mubarak. In that case, the system worked, and Mubarak continued Sadat's policies (including the "Cold Peace" with Israel.) However, Mubarak, now in his 70s, has never appointed a vice-president, and the future leadership of Egypt is uncertain. Although it is hard to imagine any Egyptian leader renouncing the peace treaty with Israel, there are many loud voices in Egypt that have forgotten the bitter costs of the repeated wars.

From an Israeli perspective, the uncertainty regarding succession among the Palestinians is also unnerving. Yasser Arafat has been a one-man show for many years, controlling Palestinian policies and public life. Arafat is aging and ill, and while he seems committed to taking the Palestinians to independence, the nature of such a Palestinian state, particularly after Arafat, is unpredictable. There are many contenders for power from both the "security" forces (the guns) and the political elite (the suits). The contest for power may become violent, and a Palestinian state may disintegrate into anarchy and civil war.

Going beyond to Iraq, Saddam Hussein's totalitarian state does not allow for any potential successors, except for his son Uday. Uday has a reputation as a playboy who is even more brutal than his father. He was seriously wounded in an assassination attempt a few years ago, and has so many enemies that he will have difficulty following his father in ruling Iraq.

Other countries, such as Morocco and Saudi Arabia, are also ruled by aging monarchs. Both states are closely aligned with Europe and the west, and instability in either would have major and negative impacts on the region.

This uncertainty in all directions is a major source of concern for Israeli decision makers from all parts of the political spectrum. The Middle East is unstable enough, even when the leaders are known and the regimes relatively stable. Israel has good reason to move slowly and make sure that agreements reached today are maintained in five years and in 50, regardless of who is in power in the neighboring countries.

Being dirty and healthy at the same time

An article by Minna Morse in the Ume Reader got me thinking about my grandmother who passed away more than 60 years ago. One of her sayings ran like this: "Dirt cleans the stomach." She used to say that when something we were about to eat fell to the floor. She would pick it up without considering that having fallen to the ground rendered the food inedible unless it was first cleaned.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Now, so many decades later, it seems there was even more to her saying. Morse refers to an article in the British journal New Scientist of July 18, 1998, which claims that "today's squeaky clean world" might help to make us ill rather than healthy.

According to Morse, an increasing number of scientists believe that our growing separation from dirt and germs may be behind the rapid rise in allergic diseases such as asthma, and perhaps even auto-immune diseases, such as diabetes and rheumatoid arthritis. She quotes the New Scientist as saying: "Wherever you look, allergic diseases seem to follow hard on the heels of wealth and modernization. Asthma, hay fever and eczema are all on the rise, and doctors report seeing more children at a younger age developing insulin-dependent diabetes."

According to this new theory, called the "hygiene hypothesis," these allergic illnesses are often the result of our society's aversion to dirt. During most of early history, the immune system was bombarded with dirt and germs from the moment each newborn infant hits the cold light of day. Just as the brain cells of a baby need stimulation to make the right connections, the argument goes, the immune system needs proper stimulation to develop properly. According to the hypothesis, exposure to the microbes that live in dirt and grime helps the immune system defend against certain diseases, particularly asthma.

I trust the reader of this column will understand that I am not about to dispense hygienic and medical information. There is a deeper reason why I bring this to your attention. A couple of hundred years ago, a movement arose on the Jewish religious scene of eastern Europe that claimed: "We can never reach the good unless we have also experienced the opposite." This heretic movement was headed by Jacob Frank, a shady character, who led its followers to experience all sorts of forbidden activities, so that they might learn to elevate themselves to greater heights. Forbidden sexual acts were the extreme expression of this "religious" abberation. It claimed that their physical diversion would stir up as the Divine sparks in the universe and stimulate the human psyche to strive for ever high goals.

On another and more acceptable level, we might say that we cannot relate to someone's pain unless we ourselves have gone through some degree of similar suffering. Opposites may often have a strange relationship, and the hygiene hypothesis may indeed make some sense in various ways. Sending our children to make mud piles might indeed to some degree be preventive medicine, but I wouldn't suggest taking either the physical practice or the metaphor too far.

The Kirshner File

King Hussein of Jordan – an assessment

In a fitting tribute to King Hussein's role as a moderating force, peacemaker and Israel's closest friend in the Arab world, a large, high-powered Israeli delegation attended his funeral in Amman last week.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Felled at the age of 63 following a six-month struggle with cancer, King Hussein was the third Arab leader after Anwar Sadat and Yasser Arafat to reach peace with Israel.

With his untimely death, Israel has lost an ally of immeasurable value. But there is no discernible reason to believe that King Hussein's hand-picked successor, his oldest son Abdullah, will not be faithful to his father's policy of maintaining a mutually beneficial friendship with Israel.

The ties that bind Israel and Jordan are geographic, political and historic: a common border, the longest of any of Israel's neighbors; a pro-Western orientation, with a strong tilt toward the United States; a desire to keep Arab/Palestinian radicalism at bay; an informal association between the Zionist movement and the Hashemite royal house, ushered in by Chaim Weizmann's 1918 meeting with Feisal, the son of the Sharif Hussein of Mecca, King Hussein's great-grandfather, a direct descendant of the prophet Mohammed and the guiding light of the 1916 Arab Revolt.

A country with few natural resources, Jordan – originally known as TransJordan – emerged from the chaos of World War I. Formerly an Ottoman backwater, TransJordan fell under British suzerainty, and Abdullah, one of the Sharif of Hussein's sons and King Hussein's grandfather, was declared its emir.

In 1921, the British colonial secretary, Winston Churchill, arbitrarily detached TransJordan from the Palestine mandate. In 1946, two years before the British government gave up its mandate in Palestine, TransJordan won its independence from Britain.

In November 1947 and again in May 1948, on the eve of the first Arab-Israeli war, Abdullah held secret talks with Golda Meyerson (Meir), a Jewish Agency representative, in a last-ditch attempt to broker an understanding about the future of Palestine. Abdullah, who harbored visions of establishing a pan-Arab state, offered the Jews semi-autonomous status under Arab sovereignty. The Jewish Agency rejected the offer.

When the War of Independence ended, Abdullah's British-trained army, the Arab Legion, had captured the West Bank. In 1950, Abdullah annexed the new areas, which the United Nations had reserved for a Palestinian state. Only Britain and Pakistan recognized the land grab.

A year later, a Palestinian assassinated Abdullah in eastern Jerusalem. Abdullah had antagonized the Palestinians because of the annexation and because of his plans to sign a non-aggression treaty with Israel.

Hussein ibn Talal, the son of Talal, who had been declared mentally unfit, was crowned king in 1953. Young and inexperienced in statecraft, King Hussein was an unlikely ruler. Yet he survived coups, a dozen attempts on his life and Israeli retaliatory raids into the West Bank. King Hussein endured one of his most serious crises in 1958. The Hashemite monarchy in Iraq had been overthrown, prompting fears that Jordan itself would be destabilized. King Hussein appealed for help, and Britain dispatched paratroopers to Jordan via Israel.

Mindful of Israel's indirect assistance, King Hussein did his best to keep the porous Israeli frontier quiet. Two-thirds of Jordan's population was composed of Palestinians, and they burned with vengeance to regain their homes and villages in Israel.

Seeking to preserve calm, King Hussein opened a backchannel to Israel. In 1963, he conducted the first of numerous clandestine meetings with top Israeli officials and prime ministers.

However, in the wake of the PLO's formation, he found it increasingly difficult to prevent Palestinian incursions into Israel. These raids forced Israel to strike back, causing unrest in Jordan. King Hussein's knack of balancing his intrinsic commitments to the Arab world with his efforts to work with Israel was severely tested.

Under the impact of Arab pressure, King Hussein signed a defence pact with Egypt, an old enemy, in May 1967. And then, with the Six Day War raging, his forces shelled Israeli-held western Jerusalem. In short order, Israel captured the West Bank, including East Jerusalem. It was a terrible blunder, a far worse one than his studied neutrality during the 1991 Gulf War, which alienated the United States, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia.

In a perfect illustration of King Hussein's sometimes schizophrenic policies, he affixed his signature to the August 1967 Khartoum declaration, which defiantly opposed a peaceful settlement, negotiations with and recognition of Israel. Yet, a few months later, he supported United Nations Resolution 242, which called for a "just and lasting peace" in the Middle East and a withdrawal of Israeli forces from the West Bank, Gaza Strip and Golan Heights. Throughout much of his reign, he sought an " honorable" peace with Israel, but insisted on a full Israeli evacuation of the territories.

During the post-1967 period, King Hussein failed to rein in Palestinian guerrillas attacking Israeli bases and settlements in the West Bank and in Israel proper. Israel bombed and shelled PLO camps in Jordan. In one notable Israeli raid against a PLO base in Karameh, just across the Jordan River, the Arab Legion joined the fighting.

Be that as it may, King Hussein acceded to Moshe Dayan's Open Bridges policy of keeping open lines of communication and commerce between the West Bank and Jordan.

In 1970, King Hussein – a benevolent despot – cracked down on the PLO, which had created a state-within-a-state in Jordan. During the ensuing civil war, Israel massed troops, forcing the retreat of a Syrian expeditionary force which had invaded northern Jordan.

Jordan tried to solve the festering Palestinian problem in 1972 with a proposal to reunite the West Bank and Jordan, but Israel rejected the idea out of hand.

Prior to the 1973 Yom Kippur War, King Hussein warned Israel to prepare itself for a massive offensive by Syria and Egypt, but the Israeli government did not heed the tip with the utmost seriousness.

King Hussein

During the war, King Hussein, in a half-hearted gesture of Arab solidarity, sent an armored brigade to the Golan, but refrained from opening a front on the West Bank. Jordan lost 28 troops and 18 tanks in the battles.

Jordan paid lip service to the Palestinian cause, but was not keen about the Arab League's 1974 decision to recognize the PLO as the "sole, legitimate" representative of the Palestinians. In 1988, during the intifadah, King Hussein severed administrative ties with the West Bank, paving the way for the 1993 Oslo agreements.

He was critical of Egypt's 1979 peace accord with Israel because it did not concretely address Palestinian concerns. But once Israel and the PLO recognized each other, King Hussein threw caution to the wind, ignored Syrian threats and established official relations with Israel. However, Jordanians who have misgivings about the peace treaty derisively describe it as "the king's peace."

King Hussein's relationship with Yitzhak Rabin, whom he eulogized as a "brother" at his 1995 funeral, was generally excellent. But he did not get on easily with Benjamin Netanyahu, twice accusing him of undermining the Oslo agreements and once, in the bungled Khaled Meshal affair, of meddling in Jordanian internal affairs.

Artificial insemination

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Comparative Law

Many single women in their late 30s and early 40s are concerned about whether they will be able to find the right person to marry while they can still have children of their own.

It is under these conditions that a new question is coming to the forefront: Is it ethical for a single woman to become pregnant via artificial insemination?

This article is based in part on a thorough and passionate article by Dvora Ross in the recently published volume, Jewish Legal Writings By Women.

One objection relates to anonymous donor sperm. Rabbi Eliezer Waldenberg (Tzitz Eliezer 9:51:4) notes that it is forbidden for a woman to remarry for three months subsequent to being divorced or widowed because we may not know who the father is (Shulchan Aruch EH 13:1), and a clear genealogy is extremely important (Yebamot 42b).

In addition, there is a concern that the child of an anonymous donor may someday meet and marry a brother or sister, unaware that they are siblings. Based on these rules, Rabbi Waldenberg forbids the use of anonymous donor sperm.

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein (Iggrot Moshe EH 2:11) dismisses this comparison. He notes that the three-month-waiting period between marriages is because the child may mistakenly think the second husband is the father, while in reality it is the first husband.

However, in the case of a sperm donor, the child is aware that the father is anonymous. Rabbi Feinstein also says the possibility a child of an anonymous sperm donor will unwittingly marry a sibling is statistically remote.

According to all opinions, this problem can be solved by using the sperm of a non-Jewish donor, or by obtaining the identity of the donor before the child marries.

Outside of the issue of an anonymous donor, there are no halachic concerns. In fact, Rabbi Y.Y. Weinberg (Seridei Eish 3:5) says that it is permissible for a single woman to use donor sperm to become pregnant.

However, others object to this on ethical grounds. One objection is that the mother and child may be targets of slander, because even a pious, chaste single woman will be accused of promiscuity when she becomes pregnant.

One has a responsibility to avoid even the appearance of scandal. As it says in Proverbs 4:24: "Remove from yourself an untrue mouth, and distance yourself from crooked lips."

Because of this concern Shlomo Zalman Auerbach argues that it is forbidden for a single woman to have a child through artificial insemination (Nishmat Avraham IV page 181).

One could argue that this concern could be answered. The mother could publicize that she intends to have a child via artificial insemination. Once the artificial insemination of single women becomes more common, this would no longer be a concern.

Another objection is based on the needs of the child. Rabbi David Golinkin writes that some studies show that children of single-parent families are psychologically disadvantaged.

However, Ross points out that these studies take place in situations of family trauma such as divorce or death. These conclusions may not be true for women who are single mothers by choice. In addition, in all families there are many other factors (parental age, economic status, living grandparents) that can affect the psychological happiness of future children. Would that mean that only those who will have children in an

Jewish Web Week nears

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You are cordially invited to spend some time with a few hundred thousand of your closest and dearest friends.

For the second year, Jewish Web Week is gearing up to encourage visitors from around the world to learn, meet, enjoy and party. Jewish Web Week 99 (JWW) begins on Sunday and continues until next Friday. Like last year, much effort is devoted to Jewish education, but there will also be a celebration of Jewish culture and music, a chance to shop and even an opportunity to join a virtual scavenger hunt. All events mentioned can be reached from the Jewish Web Week home page [http://www.jww.org].

The World Music events are being produced in conjunction with Stephen Horenstein, the director of the Jerusalem Centre for Contemporary Music, and Fellow of the Mandel School in Jerusalem. Virtual Radio JWW will present broadcasts of pre-recorded music from around the world, while the Webcast Concert for Peace will present live benefit performances.

Performers will be able to host online chats or be interviewed in a JWW forum. Music ranges from jazz, rock and classical, to experimental, klezmer and liturgical.

The online fair is a showcase for the best programs and projects using technology for Jewish education. There will be online games and resources for Purim and Pesach. As well, educators can chat in live forums about Jewish education and technology.

Like last year, special events are being planned for singles. On February 24, single men and women will be invited to attend live simultaneous parties in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Miami and Toronto. Each party will be connected by satellite, and cybercast. Every Tuesday night in New York, Rebbetzin Esther Jungreis holds her Hineni lecture where 1,000 come to study Torah and schmooze.

During Jewish Web Week, singles from around the world will also be able to attend the class through a cybercast.

Many of the organizations behind JWW99 are synagogues and other non-profit organizations [http://www.jww.org/project6/index-body.html]. But there are also many small bookstores, craftspeople and software companies who would love to get you to check out a novel piece of merchandise that might not be available in your neighborhood Judaica shop.

And when you're done shopping, how about going on a hunt – an online scavenger hunt. Groups and individuals will hunt online to learn about leadership and get to know one another at the same time. Teams will be composed of youth from various cultural and religious organizations. If you would like to organize a team in your community, register with [eric@jww.org].

So just who are all those thousands of people that will be taking part in this year's Jewish Web Week? It's hard to say, but I would like to leave you with an interesting statistic. Last year, the popular magazine Yahoo Internet Life, [http://www.yil.com/] devoted its cover story to an exploration of religion on the Internet. In God On & Off-Line, the magazine attempted to survey the world's major religions and gauge their activity on the Internet [http://www.zdnet.com/yil/content/mag/9804/godonandoff.html]. The magazine estimated that while Jews make up only 0.2 percent of the world's population, Jewish sites account for an impressive 8.5 percent of religious sites on the World Wide Web.

Those sites should be humming next week.

Rabbinic Reflections

Discovering holiness

By RABBI RON AIGEN

In this week's Torah portion of Terumah, we learn about the Jewish notion of holiness.

In the first instance, we learn where it is to be found. God says to Moses, "Let them build me a Sanctuary that I may dwell among them." (Exodus 25:8)

As our sages are fond of pointing out, God, whose presence is everywhere, does not need a dwelling place. Indeed, God's holiness cannot be contained in any limited space.

We human beings, on the other hand, do require a context in which to create or discover holiness. As the verse says, the sanctuary is the place we are to build and inhabit so that God's presence may dwell among us. This is normally understood to mean that our activity in that place will merit the association of God's presence.

When we moderns consider the activity that took place in that sanctuary, namely animal sacrifice upon the altar, we might wonder how that slaughter-site merits the association with holiness, much less God's presence. A closer examination of the ancient horned altar, however, suggests many possibilities for a concept of holiness that is still relevant for us today.

The horns of the altar, originally used for the consecration of the altar itself, may have been symbolic of strength, like the horns of the bull. Whatever strength was symbolized in these horns, we know that the horns of the altar were seized by the refugee who was seeking asylum, thus connecting the altar with the concept of justice. The rabbis further expand the meaning of holiness by understanding the altar as a tool that transformed slaughter-site into soul-symbol.

Noting the biblical injunction that the altar had to be made of earth or unhewn stone, the rabbis teach that whereas iron is for punishing, the altar is for forgiving; where iron cuts life short, the altar prolongs the life of man. Granted that the animal rights people would not be happy with this view, we can nevertheless see the rabbis' attempt to link holiness with life and not with its opposite, death.

Another rabbinic legend tells us that Adam was created from dust of the altar. Judaism recognizes the human sense of imperfection, failure, and need for atonement, forgiveness and reconciliation. By telling us that we are created from the dust of the altar, the rabbis give us the image of human beings created with original forgiveness. Here we see the effort to link the altar with the enhancement of the inner life of the human being, with those psychological or spiritual issues of existential guilt and forgiveness.

Yet a third midrash connects the altar with a wide range of spiritual values by reading the Hebrew term for altar, mizbeach, as an acrostic for mechilah, forgiveness; zechut, merit; brachah, blessing; and chayim, life.

The altar is a source of mechilah in that it was used for seeking atonement or reconciliation with God. One acquired zechut by developing the virtues of gratitude and humility. These, too, were deep human needs which found expression through the rituals associated with the altar. Through the altar-ritual, human beings become more human and hence more disposed to bestowing brachah on others. And finally, the altar signifies chayim, a life of enduring values, values that create a meaningful life.

In all these ways, the rabbis sought to connect the altar as a source of holiness with the concept of promoting (human) life on both the physical and spiritual levels. In particular, the holiness the rabbis saw in the altar, as the site of greatest holiness within the place of holiness, was directed toward the inner life of man and woman. They sought to find holiness in the deepest human needs – for forgiveness and for gratitude – and in the creation of a life of values and meaning.

Grandparenting explored

Grandparenthood*, by Dr. Ruth K. Westheimer and Dr. Steven Kaplan (Routledge, $30).

Not only are we living longer, but we tend to be more active and engaged than our grandparents. It is a somewhat frightening fact that many of today's baby-boomers will end up being grandparents for half of their lives.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Tragically, many grandparents find themselves raising a family for the second time.

There are an estimated 700,000 children being raised by grandparents in the United States because of their parents' drug habits, criminal activities or a variety of physical and mental ailments.

Ruth Westheimer, best known as a radio and T.V. expert on sex related problems, received her doctorate on the nature of the family. In her new book — written with the help of Dr. Steven Kaplan, a professor at the Hebrew University – she offers information and advice and points out available resources for troubled grandparents in search of answers to a spate of questions.

The book's approach is pragmatic, down-to-earth and encouraging. Dr. Ruth shows grandparents how to take advantage of their unique position to help enrich their own lives as well as the lives of their grandchildren, and not feel overwhelmed in the process.

The book covers a host of topics, including how to manage visits, plan new and unusual activities and make proper decisions when it comes to gift giving.

Dr. Ruth also addresses the increasingly common situations of divorce, non-traditional and multicultural families, and what happens when the grandparent becomes the parent.

On the subject of intermarriage she writes: "Your child's decision to marry outside his faith may have caused dismay, embarrassment, and even a major crisis in family relations. However, by the time grandchildren come along, it is clearly time to move on.

"Many parents only come to terms with their child's choice of a partner when a grandchild is born. The sight of their grandchild seems to melt away all their misgivings or at least push them aside."

Now in her 71st year, Dr. Ruth, recently widowed and a grandmother of three, has few regrets.

She is certain that grandparenting is one of the last adventures that she is going to experience and she doesn't plan to miss a moment of it. Neither, she insists, should you.

A Time to Tell*, by Reuben Cohen (Key Porter Books, $28.95).

Reuben Cohen is a talented, ambitious, shrewd, Maritimer. During his active life he experienced periods of success, and garnered many coveted honors. But, he also had to withstand times of abject failure and despair.

The child of poor immigrant parents, he grew up in the tiny Jewish community of Moncton.

He built a thriving law practice, became a wealthy and prominent financier, and devoted himself to charity and good works. He served as chancellor of Dalhousie University, was elevated to the Order of Canada, and was welcomed into elite business and social circles.

Then quite suddenly, Central Guaranty Trust, the company he had built so arduously and acutely over the years, collapsed. His wife, the mainstay and love of his life, died, and most of his friends deserted him.

The author's acquaintances, politicians and business colleagues included the Bronfmans, Reichmanns, McCains, Blacks, Hatfields, and Cohen relates amusing stories and anecdotes about them.

Touching on a wide range of topics, this honest, human and reflective memoir is well worth reading.

First Reform camp to open

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's first Reform summer camp is gearing up to open for its initial season this July.

The name of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism's (CCRJ's) new venture – Camp George – was announced at a recent luncheon held at the Prince Hotel.

Benefactor Sam Reisman paid tribute to his late father, for whom the camp is named, noting George Reisman's decency, determination and distaste for pretense.

"If my father were alive today, he would never permit me to name something after him," said Reisman. "May his memory be illuminated by the laughter, joy and leadership."

Joey Steiner, president of UJA Federation – which sold the Maple Lake camp site to the CCRJ – expressed pleasure that the site is staying in the Jewish community.

Previously, it was "perhaps not being used to its fullest extent," he noted. The site will remain available for adult retreats and conferences throughout the year.

Camp George will have state-of-the-art facilities for waterskiing, sailing, canoeing, kayaking, windsurfing, tennis, basketball and mountain biking, camp director Jack Feldman told The CJN. There will also be low ropes, high ropes and two climbing walls.

> 'Creative and innovative'

Arts activities and a Jewish educational component developed by a team of educators and rabbis will also be part of the summer program. "It will be very creative and innovative," Feldman said.

There are 130 campers registered thus far.

In the past, about 200 Canadian children per year have attended Reform camps in the United States, said Rabbi Allan Smith, New York-based director of the youth division of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), the central North American organization for Reform Judaism of which CCRJ is an affiliate. There are 10 UAHC camps in the United States.

Rabbi Smith expressed his appreciation to UJA Federation. "Sometimes in a community it's difficult when one particular group comes to you and says, 'Please help us.' That you did this for us...that was a sense of klal, a sense of this whole community of Israel.

"And I want you to know that this camp is about a whole community. It's about all the Jewish community of Canada, and it's about what we can do together," he said.

Gavin Herman, chair of the CCRJ camp board; Rabbi Gunther Plaut, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple; and CCRJ president Nancy Bercovitch, also spoke.

Artificial insemination, ethics, single motherhood explored ideal family situation are allowed to do so?

One serious objection is concerned with public policy. If we accept single mothers by artificial insemination, we make single motherhood respectable.

This will weaken the social strictures against having children out of wedlock. This in turn will weaken the institution of marriage.

However, this problem can be dealt with by creating guidelines for single motherhood by donors, limiting artificial insemination to women in their mid-to-late 30s who are concerned that they will not marry in time to have children.

In these individual situations it will be recognized as a decision made in a case of need, not the acceptance of an alternate lifestyle that rejects marriage.

There are few halachic reasons to prohibit artificial insemination of single women. However, several halachic authorities advance ethical and public policy arguments to prohibit this.

These concerns can be answered, and this question ought to be assessed on a case by case basis by a competent halachic authority.

USDS develops program to reduce bullying

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — A year and a half ago, a 12-year-old student complained that his peers were ostracizing him, which is considered a form of bullying.

The episode occurred while the school was in the midst of implementing an anti-bullying program, said Lucy Cohen, director of education of United Synagogue Day School (USDS).

The student and his parents approached the administration to voice their concerns, Cohen said. "The student wanted to leave the school. His parents did not want him to leave, but they were prepared to take him out because they didn't want him to suffer."

The student had filled out one of the surveys on bullying perceptions circulated by the school; students filling out the survey could share anonymously how they felt, she said.

"It allowed this student to disclose how he felt. He felt safe to disclose his feelings."

The administration and teachers had already begun participating in training sessions on bullying. They worked privately with the boy and organized group discussions to raise sensitivity among his classmates, Cohen said.

"The other students were not aware that their behavior had such an impact on the boy.

"The kids became very supportive. They learned to recognize and identify bullying behavior and the subtle behavior that they might not have perceived as bullying prior to this."

In this situation, the program worked, and the boy who initially experienced the difficulties is happy now, Cohen reported.

She said this was one of several instances of bullying that have been effectively handled by the school since the anti-bullying program was inaugurated.

When bullying came to the attention of the Parents Association (PA) of USDS about three years ago, parent Debbie Kornhauser offered to look into improving the situation at the school.

The association then agreed to sponsor Kornhauser's attendance at a conference on bullying at York University.

Kornhauser, a mother of three USDS students, told The CJN that experts tend to view bullying as a form of physical, psychological or verbal aggression, as well as an imbalance of power. The victims generally have difficulty defending themselves.

"A person is being bullied when he or she is exposed repeatedly over time to negative actions on the part of one or more persons," she explained.

Through the PA, the parents took their concerns to Cohen, who agreed that the problem needed to be addressed and asked that a committee be set up to deal with the issue, Kornhauser said.

The USDS anti-bullying committee, which is made up of parents, teachers, administrators and a social worker from Jewish Family & Child Service, was established in October 1996, and has been chaired by Kornhauser since its inception.

The committee made it clear that bullying behavior of any kind is unacceptable and that everyone has the right to learn in a safe environment and be treated with respect, Kornhauser said.

The committee then turned to York University professor Debra Pepler, an expert on bullying who was hired as a consultant. She helped the group to determine the needs of the school and to adopt a strategy.

In 1997, Pepler met with the teachers to sensitize them to the issues of bullying and she gave a three-part training program. She also spoke at a parent meeting.

With her help, the committee developed a policy on bullying for the whole school.

"We created an addendum to the school's official code of behavior with respect to bullying," Kornhauser said.

She stressed that the clarification of the code of behavior was in accordance with Jewish values where children develop a sense of respect for others. "The school is committed to fostering derech eretz, respect, as a primary focus."

Many of the teachers have incorporated aspects of the anti-bullying program into the curriculum to develop empathy among the students, Kornhauser said.

The committee spent a year preparing a school-wide procedures manual on bullying, which, after being approved by the education committee in June, was distributed to all staff members. A parent copy was sent out to all families this summer, she said.

In September, the committee, which now includes two new guidance counsellors hired by the school, changed its name to the committee for peaceful problem solving, to reflect its new direction, Kornhauser said.

Campers Absorb Story of Sorrow and Success

Danny Admasso may be typical of many young, Ethiopian Jews in Israel today - courageous, hard-working, and determined. But, for Camp Ramah staff and campers last summer, Danny was not the 'typical' counsellor. Hired as a Judaica specialist and brought over from Israel, Danny's voyage from Ethiopia to Israel, thanks to the Jewish Agency, funded by the worldwide UJA Federation movement, left a profound and lasting emotional impact on counsellors and campers alike.

Growing up in a tiny Ethiopian village of only four families, Danny was a shepherd with very little schooling. In addition to farming, his father made tools, while his mother created ceramics to sell at the city market once a week. "Our lives were very primitive," he said, during an interview from Israel with Jewish Toronto. "There weren't many modern things."

Danny's father taught his eight children about Israel and read Torah with them in Amharic, their native language. (His mother had already died in childbirth.) It was all in preparation for the escape from government persecution about which his father dreamed.

In 1984, when Danny was nine-years-old, his entire family made their first attempt to flee. Caught by government officials, they were jailed for two weeks after being stripped of all their money and assets. "We couldn't continue living in our village," said Danny. "Everything we had was gone. It was empty."

Two months later, they tried again with a hired guide to accompany them. A donkey and some horses carried what few possessions they had, as 40 people began their trek on foot. When robbers interrupted their journey and confiscated all their possessions, Danny's family was forced into slave labour for a month. Finally permitted to continue, the family journeyed fearfully by night, shoeless and sleeping in caves. "A lot of people died on the way," Danny recalled. "You could see them dying of thirst or from exhaustion. It was a big tragedy, but we had to continue."

Many of those who survived the traumatic trip to Sudan were so desperate for water, they drank from the filthy river and died from contamination. Others perished from infested food during their seven month wait in a Sudanese refugee camp.

Israel at last

But Israel wasn't far away. "I felt like I was in a dream," remembered Danny, after the Jewish Agency flew the family to Israel.

With the death of his father soon after their aliyah, Danny was orphaned at ten, and sent to an Israeli government boarding school. "They helped me a lot and took care of me," he said.

Now, after his army service, Danny counsels homeless and drug abused youth, saving his salary for his next challenge - university. "My dream is to be a doctor," he said, "because I want to save lives and help people."

comfort and fear

His summer experience last year at Camp Ramah helped Danny to confront his suffering. "Every time I told the story I was crying," he admitted. "It was good to tell them that other Jews have lived a different life."

"I think seeing a young Ethiopian Israeli and hearing about his difficult life is what shocked me the most," observed Assistant Camp Director, Debbie Spiegel. "His young adulthood is so vastly different than the North American youth experience - having kids relate to that is crucial for our Jewish leaders."

"During one evening of staff education, Danny spoke about his experiences travelling from Ethiopia to Israel," added Camp Director, Rabbi Mitchell Cohen. "As he described the death of his loved ones, everyone could not help but feel for him. It also intensified everyone's feelings of Zionism, and pride in the fact that the State of Israel, with all of its problems, still creates miracles."

For Danny, his gratitude to the worldwide Jewish community and the Jewish Agency is evident. "You dream, and someone makes your dream come true. How do you say thank you?"

The Jewish Agency has airlifted over 21,000 Jews from Ethiopia and helped them integrate into Israeli life.

A Day in the Life of Our Chief Chaplain jewish toronto

by Adi Neuberger

After spending an afternoon with Rabbi Ronald Weiss, head of the UJA Federation-funded Jewish Family & Child Service Chaplaincy Service, one can't help but realize that the Chief Chaplain's modest mission of mercy is actually quite monumental.

Although the objective remains constant - to deliver comfort, strength and spiritual guidance to those in need - whatever their circumstance and wherever they may be - there's nothing routine about this rabbi's line of work.

Anything can happen at anytime, as I found out one snowy winter day when I accompanied Rabbi Weiss to observe a day in his life.

"I'll go wherever I'm needed"

I ask Rabbi Weiss how he prepares for difficult situations, after a briefing about our first stop - an emergency call he received earlier in the day. "I don't," he responds, as we make our way to a downtown hospital to console a young woman who recently failed at her fifth suicide attempt. "What will you say to her?" I inquire as we arrive. "I'll take her lead and see how it goes. I have no agenda," he replies.

After spending half an hour at the bedside of the distraught 23-year-old, who relayed a lifetime of heartache and sorrow through intermittent tears, it was time to say goodbye and move on to the next visit. But not before Rabbi Weiss disappeared momentarily to respond to a second emergency call from a chaplain at another downtown hospital. This time the person in need of Weiss' services was a recently widowed woman confused about Jewish burial customs.

While heading north to see a terminally ill hospice patient confined to a bed in her parents' home, Rabbi Weiss finally reaches the anxious widow by cell phone after a dozen attempts. "I'm so sorry about your recent loss," he says in a quiet, sympathetic voice, while he weaves through traffic and retrieves phone numbers of Jewish funeral homes from a computerized address book.

"When I can't get to someone in person, at least I'm just a phone call away," Weiss tells me. "It's better than nothing - isn't it?" I agree and ask if the nature of his work ever gets him down. He asked if I could wait for the answer until after our next and final visit. "This one might be a little tough," warns Weiss. "But I think it'll give you a good sense of what chaplaincy is all about."

Upon leaving the modest home of this brave, intelligent woman coping with terminal illness, while struggling to maintain her dignity, I realize what Weiss meant. The middle-aged former media professional could barely muster the strength to engage her visitor in their usual theological dialogue, yet somehow managed to break a smile as they parted. She was glad he came and he felt it.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss on one of his many daily visits.

The Chief Chaplain's days, which usually begin at 7:30 a.m., and often end long after his four kids are asleep, consist mainly of brief visits to community members in any number of private and public facilities across the city. Weiss heads a corps of 150 dedicated JF&CS Chaplaincy Service volunteers, who make their way to 33 hospitals, 45 nursing homes and 24 prisons, offering an unconditional supply of compassion and care to the sick, the isolated, the institutionalized and those held in correctional institutions.

"I go wherever I'm needed, whether I'm asked to recite a prayer with a mourner or just exchange a few friendly words," explains Weiss. "My job is to provide comfort and strength to anyone who seeks it."

The Boston-born Weiss studied at Brandeis University before graduating from Yeshiva University and becoming the rabbi of a small Orthodox congregation in upstate New York. Weiss admits chaplaincy work was not his first calling. "It's not what I always envisioned myself doing. Nonetheless I feel I'm providing a much-needed service."

The rabbi and I hardly speak during the short drive back to my office. Our last visit has not only left me speechless and emotionally drained - it has also provided me with all the answers I need - and then some.

If you are interested in becoming a Jewish Family & Child Service Chaplaincy Service volunteer, call Program Coordinator Toby Maskowitz, at (416) 638-7800 ext. 287.

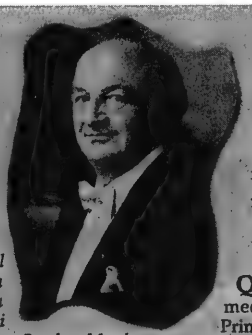
with Leon Levy

Sephardi Ambassador Extraordinaire



Leon Levy is one of the most influential Jews in the United States. As Immediate Past Chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations (an umbrella group for 53 U.S. Jewish organizations), he has travelled the world spreading goodwill. Levy led a delegation to Israel with President Bill Clinton for the funeral of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and was one of 10 recipients worldwide, to accept Spain's Concorde Prize, a gesture of retribution on the 500th anniversary of the expulsion of Jews from Spain. As a licensed civil engineer, Levy applied his expertise to, among other projects, restoration of the Statue of Liberty. Born to Sephardi parents, who emigrated from Turkey, Levy is best recognized for his tireless efforts on behalf of the Sephardi community. He will be speaking at a UJA Federation Sephardi Network event on Sunday, March 7, 8:00 p.m. For details, see Around Jewish Toronto on the previous page.

In a recent telephone interview with Elaine Fogel, Levy describes his unique experiences as an international Sephardi ambassador.

Q: Tell us about worldwide Sephardi community accomplishments.

A: What we have done is to unite Sephardic organizations and tackle problems that differentiate us from the Ashkenazi community. In Israel, the Sephardim are gaining more credibility in their day-to-day lives. They're not being treated as poorly as they were 25 years ago in education and certainly in politics. That will continue. Our job is to get on the map so they know there is an organized Sephardic community out there. And we're still doing it.

Q: I understand that you had a meeting a few years ago with the Prime Minister of Greece. What was that about?

A: I met with the late Papandreou for the World Jewish Congress. We tried to discourage the Greeks from issuing identity cards with a religion designated on it. We were totally opposed to it. Their reason was not necessarily to put Jews in a special light, but I think they wanted to go after the Muslims. We very strongly objected to passports having a "J" on it to identify Jews.

Q: You were one of the ten recipients of Spain's retribution gesture on the 500th anniversary of the expulsion of Jews in 1492. Can you tell us about that?

A: That was a highlight. We were very involved with the 500th anniversary. Spain was reaching out in friendliness. They give an annual prize, comparable to the Nobel Prize, called the Prince of Asturias Awards, but the major award, the Concorde Prize, was given to the Sephardi Jews of the world. It was very special.

Q: What do you see as your next challenge?

A: We have to combat assimilation. Sephardi Jews have a strong identity and tradition and we believe in tolerance and moderation. We want to attract our next generation to the fact that they come from a heritage of pride. My goal is to do what little I can to strengthen the association of our people with our rich, exotic heritage.

Shad Valley's summer program definitely not for the nerds

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Laura Erdman's friends teased her about going to "nerd camp" when she applied to the Shad Valley summer program for senior high school students.

The award-winning program, which focuses on science, technology and entrepreneurship, is run at eight Canadian university campuses every July by Shad International, an independent organization based in Waterloo, Ont. Over 400 students participate.

Erdman and five other Canadian Jewish students – Joy Abramson, Arneet Saltzman, Amos Bitzan, Aviva Leber and Michael Lebedinsky – were among the award-winners of the first annual Royal Bank Shad Entrepreneurship Cup, announced at the Science Teachers Association of Ontario annual conference late last year.

For the contest, student teams created an original product. Entries – including a short video and detailed business and marketing plans – represented the best effort from each campus.

The nerd image is "a big misconception," said Erdman. "The people were just amazing." They're typical teenagers, she insisted, but they "happen to not think that school is the worst thing that ever happened to [them]."

Subject matter, nonetheless, might appear daunting. Environmental engineering, particle physics, finite math and logic were some of the topics addressed. Leadership, business and teamwork were key aspects of the program, but recreational activities also played an important role.

For Erdman, an alumna of United Synagogue Day School who is now in her OAC year at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Shad represented not only a tremendous learning experience but her first "secular" experience.

There's more to life than studying for Aviva Leber, left, and Laura Erdman, seen on an outing at the Shad Valley summer program.

A multicultural night at the University of New Brunswick campus proved to be "a very good bonding experience," she said. She participated in a presentation on Judaism and learned about various nationalities, including one she'd never heard of.

Leber, an Ottawan in her OAC year at Sir Robert Borden High School, hopes to study medicine. An alumna of Montreal's United Talmud Torah, she met Erdman when they were assigned as roommates, and participated with her as part of a larger group on the project that won the award for best prototype, an Internet- and CD-ROM-based driving school. Leber served as financial manager, while Erdman worked on the business plan. The pair are now good friends.

Mike Lebedinsky designed the virtual driving school. Born in Moldova and raised in Israel from age six until two years ago when his family moved to Calgary, Lebedinsky changed all his plans for university as a result of Shad.

The Henry Wise Wood High School alumnus chose a new major and a new school at the last minute, opting to study Communications Engineering at Carleton University.

The Best Business and Best Overall awards went to the Carleton University team, headed by Abramson, a CHAT graduate who is a first-year Engineering student at the University of Toronto. Saltzman, an OAC student in the gifted program at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, was operations director for their project, an improved skate guard for in-line skates.

Shad was "a lot of work, but it's worth it," said Saltzman.

Amos Bitzan, an OAC classmate of Saltzman's whose twin brother John also took part in the Shad program, worked on the marketing aspect and business plan of a project called Child Trak and Forget-Me-Not at the University of British Columbia campus. The system, which won second prize overall, is designed to warn parents, by emitting a beep when their children stray too far. With modifications, the same system can be used to keep tabs on valuables.

The students all agreed they left they program more well-rounded.

"Meeting all these really great people from all over the country was probably the greatest benefit," said Bitzan.

"It's one of the most amazing things I've ever done," said Abramson.

York student creates do-it-yourself mezuzah kit

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Sam Stone, a fourth year design student at York University, has combined his design talents with his entrepreneurial skills to create a do-it-yourself mezuzah kit.

"I stumbled into the Judaica design scene and it has turned out to be quite wonderful," says Stone, 23. He adds that the design of Judaica artifacts requires a great deal of research.

Stone had attended the industrial design program at Carlton University. After his first year, he decided to work for an architectural firm to gain experience and to explore career options.

He later enrolled in the Faculty of Fine Arts at York University which gave him "flexibility to explore different design disciplines as well as traditional art forms," he says.

Throughout his four year program, Stone has been working as a freelance designer. He has designed corporate literature, furniture, glass screens, and architectural design projects.

His introduction to Judaica came in 1997 when he was referred to Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. He was told that Kolel needed a portable ark for its programming.

The ark was submitted to the Jewish Students' Arts Festival where it won honorable mention. Later it garnered two additional awards.

"The ark opened up projects of all different kinds in the Jewish community for me including, a religious school which commissioned me to create a kit where bar and bat mitzvah students could construct their own yad (pointer) for reading Torah."

The school later asked Stone to come in and teach the students the history of the yad and about Judaica design.

"The yad program went so well," says Stone, "that they asked me to create a similar program for mezuzot."

The project received an enthusiastic response from rabbis, artists and religious school educators of both adults and children. He ran the program as part of Jewish Campus Services' Jewish awareness month in January.

Soon he was leading mezuzah programs for groups. He has designed a contemporary mezuzah kit with instructions, which is now being sold at Israel's Judaica. The kit will soon be available at other Judaica stores.

A sampling of the mezuzah kit. Inset is its creator Sam Stone.

He also created a format for others who wish to lead the program in other cities.

Stone, who will be completing his design program at York this spring, says he intends to continue his freelance design work this summer.

He stresses that he is "a designer of Judaica along with other design areas and disciplines."

In the fall, he will intern for three months at Atelier Mendini, a world famous design studio in Milan, Italy.

"This is a great opportunity for me to learn from people on the cutting edge of the world design scene."

Activist Abrams aimed to stop 'mockery of murder, genocide'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Victoria businessman Harry Abrams, the recent tribunal ruling that retired columnist Doug Collins and the North Shore News promoted hatred against Jews was the culmination of a lengthy and sometimes harrowing experience.

Fueled by a dogged desire to put a stop to "a mockery of murder and genocide," Abrams launched the case with a complaint before the B.C. Human Rights Commission. He alleged a series of articles written by Collins in 1994 promoted contempt of Jews.

The case was no ordinary file-and-forget legal matter for Abrams. On the contrary. It marked a coming of age in his efforts to stop those who would vilify Jews. While today he may be fielding dozens of phone calls from well-wishers who applaud his gumption, seven months ago it was quite a different matter.

Harry Abrams

It was midsummer and the case was about to resume after a lengthy adjournment. Abrams was in an outdoor cafe discussing the white supremacist movement with a reporter when they were interrupted by a call on Abrams' cell phone.

It was his wife. She had just received an anonymous call in which part of a conversation Abrams was having with a woman about the white supremacist movement was played back to her.

Abrams was shaken. It was a recording of the conversation he was having with the reporter.

"I felt I was being followed, that someone with a long-distance microphone was recording me and phoning back to intimidate me," he said.

Abrams reported the incident to the police but no arrests have been made.

Undaunted, Abrams proceeded with the case. Two weeks ago a B.C. Human Rights Tribunal ordered Collins and the North Shore News to pay Abrams $2,000, to refrain from printing articles that promoted contempt of Jews and to publish relevant portions of the judgment in the paper.

"I'm very pleased," Abrams said, "It's a landmark decision. I think it's historic for the Jewish community in Canada. It's historic for human rights."

Dismissing suggestions the decision will restrict free speech, Abrams declared the judgment "a victory for freedom of speech. It's a defeat for his (Collins') version of speech...[in which] he picked on people because of their characteristics.

"It's not a fair goal to vilify people for characteristics they cannot change. That's beyond fair comment."

Beyond winning the case, Abrams feels the decision "has galvanized my experience in Jewish human rights advocacy...Most people don't want to deal with these issues, to study anti-Semitism, the nature of hate, what makes them tick, their psychology."

A native of Montreal who moved to Victoria in 1982, Abrams runs his own advertising business. His first interest in extremist politics goes back to 1986 when lawyer Doug Christie brought neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel to Victoria for a speaking engagement at the prestigious Empress Hotel.

A "community outcry" ensued that prompted the Empress to cancel the booking, Abrams said.

During the early '90s, Abrams learned that neo-Nazi groups were organizing in the area "with impunity" but he was galvanized into action when he found a copy of the North Shore News containing Collins' articles delivered to his door as an insert in a now defunct Victoria paper.

With further issues of the paper, Abrams began to see "a definite pattern" in which Jews were attacked in Collins' articles.

'I understood this was something I was going to do'

A booklet published by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre on Holocaust denial put the issue into perspective for him and prompted him to contact Sol Littman, the centre's Canadian representative.

After a long conversation "I realized that my fate [had changed]. It was like a calling. I understood this was something I was going to do."

In 1994, he became a volunteer researcher for the centre, studying the proliferation of hate materials on the Internet.

Abrams later switched allegiances to B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights and in 1996 he was appointed the B.C. representative of the League.

The League eventually entered the case as one of several interveners, backing Abrams' position.

For Abrams the issue was clear: "They're not going to make a mockery of murder and genocide. We have to challenge it, fight it. We can't let it pass and forsake the memories of those who were murdered."

Mac students get new adviser

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Although there are about 300 to 500 Jewish students at McMaster University, only 127 have signed up with the McMaster Jewish Students Association (MJSA).

That's not nearly enough for Judy Schwartz, the new MJSA adviser, who would like to see every Jewish student on campus involved.

Schwartz, a Burlington resident, has spoken about Judaism in schools, churches and to women's groups. She succeeds Sheila Freedman, who died last fall.

Schwartz and her husband Dennis, Toronto natives, lived in Israel for 2½ years. Their daughter Noa, was born there. Years later, their second daughter Ora, has made aliyah.

"As I get accustomed to the job, I will get more pro-active," promises Schwartz. She would like to do "a real promotion," but acknowledges that the best way is through the students.

The MJSA is the only group to have its own lounge, office and kitchen on campus. She became aware of the importance of the office, says Schwartz, when she realized that the MJSA is "the last outpost for any form of Judaism to be ignited."

But the office was open only on Thursdays from 11 a.m. to 1.30 p.m., when a kosher lunch was provided. Schwartz felt "that was totally inadequate," and now opens the rooms on Tuesdays and Wednesdays as well, and would like them to be open Monday through Thursday. She makes sure there's always kosher food available for snacks.

"This should be the home away from home for the students," she says.

Rabbi Zalman Itkin of the Chabad Jewish Centre regularly attends Thursday lunches, and Rabbi Irving Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Sholom also comes.

On Tuesday evenings, there is a free bagel dinner and study group led by Rabbi Meir Joshua of the Jewish Enrichment Centre of Hamilton, on "any Jewish subject the students wish to discuss."

Schwartz is "unbelievably impressed" with the students. "There's a spark in them...they really want to learn," she says.

While she would like to see as much programming as possible, Schwartz realizes that it must be "on the students' time. They have to study, they have jobs, exams...I consider myself their silent leader," she says. "They have to feel it's their organization and they have to run it."

The MJSA executive is headed by Monika Roseman and Dan Kobric, co-presidents.

Tight control of finances pays off for Hamilton JCC

HAMILTON — Years of tight financial controls have paid off for the Jewish Community Centre of Hamilton-Wentworth.

There was obvious relief at the recent annual general meeting when treasurer Joel Feldman presented the financial report, and accountant Larry Matlow of Vine & Partners, auditors for the JCC, expressed satisfaction at "the way things have gone [thanks to] the tighter controls that have been put in place."

The JCC, Brown reported, raised over $200,000 in the last three years towards its debt retirement. But, he assured the meeting, "we won't start a capital campaign until that's been taken care of."

Brown was referring to the long-awaited development of the JCC's approximately 26 acres of land and to the renovation planned for the existing building.

Meanwhile, he announced that a committee would be set up to canvass the community, to determine whether it "will support the JCC with memberships and dollars."

Plans for the coming year include an intensive membership drive and the development of new programs, especially for young people, he said.

The JCC, he said, is presently engaged in discussions with a Young Judaea shaliach in Toronto, who he hopes will come to Hamilton.

Meanwhile, said Brown, Sandy Levy and Vivienne Epstein are working with the young people and preparing programs.

He also announced that Hamilton will participate in an international youth weekend for smaller Jewish communities planned by the Windsor JCC.

Brown made special presentations to Rachel Loewith and Dana Brown, volunteers with Tzedaka Tzentrepieces, a fundraising project for teens initiated by the Loewith family, "which has proved to be a wonderful fundraiser for Jewish social services."

Announcing the establishment of an annual Volunteer Leader of the Year award in memory of the late Barry Foster, Brown presented the plaque that was to have been given to Foster as Volunteer of 1998, to his widow, Joy, the JCC's administrator. —M.W.

Canada's support for the resolution, however, was tempered with several concerns.

"We regret that the General Assembly is again using the Emergency Special Session mechanism in a manner which is not helpful," the Canadian statement said. "Moreover, we find that the resolution has been complicated by language which will not benefit the peace process and elements which are not germane to the question of the convening of the conference on the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention."

Given Canada's misgivings about the resolution, it should have voted against or at least abstained, said an angry Ritter.

This was not a run-of-the-mill anti-Israel resolution at the UN, he believes.

"It's really disturbing that they're using extraordinary measures [the emergency special session]. What I find galling is that with all the problems in the world, this is the one the UN singles out."

In effect, the resolution violates both the Oslo and the Wye River agreements because it attempts to move the peace process from bilateral talks between Israel and the Palestinians, to an international forum, the CIC says.

Canada is also effectively violating two fundamental principles of its Middle East policy, said CIC national chair Brian Morris: first, that it will avoid taking actions or making statements which undermine direct, bilateral talks between Israel and its peace partners, or otherwise prejudge the outcome of those negotiations; and second, that Canada, by its own explanation for its vote, opposes "any unilateral actions that would jeopardize peace..."

Harold Brief, who chairs the Israel affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, said CJC is "very, very disappointed" with Canada's support for the resolution.

"When one reads Canada's explanation for its vote, one would assume it would either vote against or at least abstain," Brief said.

In a letter to Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy, Simon Rosenblum, national co-president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, said Canada's yes vote "gave credibility to a stunt which can do nothing to further peace-making in the region."

Resolution was 'extremely unbalanced'

The resolution was "highly rhetorical" and "extremely unbalanced," Peace Now said.

Israel has long disputed the applicability of the Geneva Convention to the territories on the grounds that the lands were not under any legitimate rule between 1948 and 1967.

The CIC also believes the Geneva Conventions are being misapplied to Israel.

The conventions were drafted in response to steps by the Nazis before and during World War II to forcibly transfer civilians to territories occupied as a result of unprovoked military aggression, whereas Jews are choosing to reside in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and areas of Jerusalem that had been inhabited by Jews prior to 1948, and conquered by Israel in 1967 after a "purely defensive" war, the CIC says.

The CIC Canada's support for the UN resolution "is cause for further intensifying our approach to the government. This will be done."

Last Friday, Axworthy used Canada's new chairmanship of the UN's Security Council as a soapbox when he called on the world to begin talking about ways to protect civilians caught up in armed conflicts.

Past UN assemblies also asked Switzerland, as the depository of the Geneva Conventions, to convene a conference of the treaty's signatories. It organized a meeting last October, attended by some experts, but has yet to arrange a full-scale conference.

This time, however, Switzerland said the UN established no mechanism for a global conference,

"Switzerland cannot contemplate an active role in convening and holding a conference of this type unless the state parties first define a solid basis for the implementation of such a measure," said a Swiss UN observer.

Although the Palestinians won the vote for the conference, "we'll have to wait and see if they want it after the Israeli election," said a European UN envoy.

Stewart Wheeler, a spokesman for for the Department of Foreign Affairs, told The CJN that Canada's explanation of its vote speaks for itself.

"Canada remains greatly concerned at settlement activity in East Jerusalem and the Occupied Territories."

At the same time, Canada is "a strong supporter of getting both sides to achieve a durable and lasting peace," Wheeler said.

Canadian Jewish educators gather in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Passion.

It's a teacher's most valuable tool. A teacher must have passion for what he or she teaches, says Arna Panar Poupko, and that's especially important for a Jewish teacher.

"A great teacher is one whose character shines through," Poupko, a well-known Jewish educator, told an audience of Jewish educators here earlier this month.

The Judaic consultant for Montreal's Jewish Federation was keynote speaker for the inaugural Western Coalition of Jewish Educators Conference, held at the Asper Jewish Community Campus. The meeting attracted Jewish day school teachers and administrators from Vancouver, Edmonton and Calgary as well as teachers and parents from Winnipeg.

"Most people see life as a journey," Poupko noted. "Such is Jewish education. The joy comes not in reaching your destination but in the discoveries along the way."

Successful teaching, she observed, comes from a strong knowledge of the material, an appreciation of that material and a commitment to it.

"In our society, people avoid declarations or statements about ethics and values," she said. "I believe that Jewish teachers must develop personal beliefs and ideals about Judaism and must be willing to represent them."

As well, teachers must continue to study, read and evolve.

"If we don't do it ourselves, if we are not turned on by Judaism, how can we expect to turn on our students? To be a Jewish teacher is more than just a job. It is a noble calling."

Poupko also was one of five panelists debating the pluralistic nature of most Jewish schools' student bodies. She argued that pluralism should be approached from a positive point of view, ideally with equal time given to each of Judaism's major denominations.

Instead, the result of most pluralistic Jewish day schools is the lowest common denominator, by which the schools can offend the least number of people, she said.

Robin Meyerowitz, who teaches at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Winnipeg, agreed that pluralism is a nebulous term which can often lead to a bland approach to Jewish education.

"Students in class should be talking about and arguing about their differences," she said. "They should be given the opportunity to explore different ideas and be exposed to different rabbis. Some children know where they stand religiously.

"Many others are still searching."

Rabbi Michael Levinson of Temple Shalom observed that most Winnipeg Jews don't know a lot about the Reform movement even though many households here are "Reform-style," with a liberal approach to Judaism.

At the same time, he said he feels it is important for children in his congregation to be exposed to traditional Jewish practices and be comfortable with them.

Rabbi Charles Grysman argued that pluralism is fine as long as a school's philosophy is built around some key tenets which are acceptable to all the Jewish religious movements.

"Students should be able to connect with something meaningful and substantial," said Rabbi Grysman, spiritual leader of Ketulat Zichron Yisrael in Thornhill and a teacher, teacher supervisor and curriculum consultant at Netivot HaTorah Day School.

The idea for the conference was born two years ago with the establishment of the Western Coalition of Jewish Educators.

"It sometimes seems that the 'real' Jewish world is in eastern Canada and the rest of us are in the west," said Jack Solomon, director of education for Winnipeg's Grey Academy, in his welcoming presentation.

"The coalition gives us, as educators from smaller communities in Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver the opportunity to discuss common concerns and issues and joint programming. We are thrilled to be hosting this first conference here."

Jemmie (Gord) Silver welcomed the opportunity to get together with fellow Jewish educators. "Our Jewish communities in western Canada are only large enough to support one or two day schools," said Silver, a teacher and vice-principal of Calgary's Akiva Academy. "There is not much opportunity for Judaic studies development."

Other presenters were Dr. Alex Pomson, co-ordinator of the Jewish Teacher Education program in the Faculty of Education at York University; Mooli Broog, national education emissary for the Jewish National Fund in Canada; Dr. Claude Oppenheim, director of the Calgary Jewish Academy; and Sylvio Berlfein who has been leading Israeli dance workshops for over 20 years.

הייה שלום,חוסיין:

" שלום גידי , מחובתו של כל ישראלי להסכים עם חומרת העניין של סיכון אובדן הדמוקרטיה בישראל. כפי שטענת שבוע שעבר "אם ישראל באמת חשובה לנו- צריך לדאוג שהיא תמשיך להיות דמוקרטיה מערבית ולא... נוסח טורקיה".
בתודה, טליה רותם- אסף. סגן מנהלת הקרן החדשה לישראל בקנדה."

Retirees help Jews for Judaism

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO—Retirees Jerry and Sandra Genesove have earned the praise and recognition "for their extraordinary contribution to Jews for Judaism's growth in Canada," says Julius Ciss, the executive director of Jews for Judaism.

Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, thanks to the efforts of the energetic duo, has raised more funds for Jews for Judaism than any other synagogue in North America to date."

Jerry, 69, who taught at Parkdale Collegiate and was the only high school teacher at the Toronto Board of Education who wore a kippah during classes, retired three years ago. Sandra worked in the movie industry as a booker for Columbia and Orion Pictures. She retired five years ago.

"Although I have been a volunteer throughout my life,now that I am a senior and retired and I have more leisure time, Jerry said.

"I believe that being an active volunteer not only helps many needy causes, but also keeps me mentally agile and gives me a feeling of accomplishment."

Sandra served as a volunteer at the Queen Street Mental Health Centre. She and Jerry were both on the board of Boys Town Jerusalem and they are presently on the board of Dental Volunteers for Israel.

At the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue they work as a team, volunteering on numerous committees. Twelve years ago they formed the Entertainment and Cultural Connection, which presents monthly programs featuring speakers, comedy acts, musical evenings and fundraisers for charitable causes.

Speaking of missionaries, Jerry told The CJN that one of the upsetting moments was when a Jewish teacher told him that he considered himself a Christian Jew.

"This was quite a shock to me. During our conversations, I discovered that the teacher had no real knowledge of Judaism. Thus, he was easy prey to missionaries."

This incident fortified his interest in helping "other Jews resist Christian missionaries targeting Jews. Five years ago, the Genesoves established an annual fundraising program for Jews for Judaism.

The Entertainment and Cultural Connection joined with Shaarei Shomayim's Brotherhood to present a musical evening with The Shpeelers, a volunteer group of musicians who presented a program "with a touch of klezz;" all proceeds were donated to Jews for Judaism.

The first campaign raised $2,000. That amount doubled the following year and has continued to increase annually. Last year, more than $11,500 was collected and Jerry says that this year "we expect that it will be even more successful."

While Sandra looks after the arrangements and keeps the records, Jerry is energetically soliciting the congregation's members for donations.

"Jerry and Sandy deserve a hearty yasher koach for their truly selfless efforts," Ciss said.

This year's musical program with The Shpeelers will be held on March 21, at 8 p.m. at Shaarei Shomayim. The musicians will be Dr. Leslie Train, Les Aaron, Dr. Alfred Silver, Gurion Hyman, Belarie and Martin Zatzman, Sheryl Saperia, and comedian Sam Rosen.

When applauded for their efforts by Ciss, Jerry replied, "Don't thank us, thank the members of Shaarei Shomayim and the many others who believe in what Jews for Judaism has accomplished."

Jerry added that he hopes that every synagogue in the country would also raise money for Jews for Judaism "and help to counter the missionary threat which I hope would put the missionaries out of business.

"I challenge every shul, in fact, every Jewish organization, in the country to do just that."

Hatzoloh dispatches emergency first aid service

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In two to three minutes, or even less, part of Toronto's Jewish community can receive emergency first aid service from Hatzoloh, a volunteer organization.

Hatzoloh began in New York in the 1960s as a service mainly for the city's Orthodox population. It can now be found all over the world, including in Israel, Australia, England, Switzerland and Mexico. Montreal has had this service since the winter of 1996.

Heshie Kuhnreich, best known as one of the leaders of the Zemer Orchestra, is executive director of Toronto Hatzoloh. He explained that there are 12 dispatchers, who work from their homes using a sophisticated telephone communication system, and 18 responders, all highly trained emergency medical technicians.

"From a practical point of view, they are equivalent to a standard level 1 Ontario paramedic," he said. They are able to deal with such crises as heart attacks, trauma, allergic reactions, motor vehicle accidents, choking and imminent childbirth.

They are trained to use defibrillators, and to administer basic medications like the epi-pen for allergic reactions, or nitroglycerin. They are not permitted to start IV lines, to prescribe drugs or to transport patients to a hospital.

Hatzoloh is not intended to replace or compete with 911 or Metro ambulance service; indeed, Kuhnreich said, relations are excellent between it and Toronto's emergency service organizations. Rather, he said, one complements the other.

When a person calls Hatzoloh, the dispatcher will quickly decide whether his or her needs will be best met by Hatzoloh, or if 911 should be called as well or instead. If necessary, the dispatcher will call 911, as well as calling the nearest volunteer to respond to the call.

Every volunteer will show an identification badge when he arrives and should not be allowed in without it, Kuhnreich said.

Each responder has in his car a full set of top-of-the-line medical equipment, including braces, splints, oxygen and basic medicines. Some cars have defibrillators, and Kuhnreich said efforts are being made to equip all volunteers with one.

Hatzoloh is connected with the disaster services programs of the city, as it is in most places where it has been introduced. For example, in last year's ice storm in Montreal, it was discovered that the water was not safe to drink. A message was sent out over radio and television, but it was realized that the Orthodox community would not hear it, because it was issued on a Friday night. Urgences Santé, the Montreal emergency services program, took members of Hatzoloh door to door in the Jewish areas to give the warning in person.

Hatzoloh can also be present at large community events, such as it was at the Israel at 50 celebration, in case they are needed.

Kuhnreich said that Hatzoloh is necessary because of the uniqueness of the Jewish community in areas such as language and cultural issues. For instance, he said, "if you respond to a call on Friday night and find a bottle of wine on the table, you have to realize that the family aren't drunks, but are saying kiddush."

Two people respond to each call, said Kuhnreich, and nearly everyone speaks both Hebrew and Yiddish.

All the volunteers are trained not only medically, but also in halachic issues. Questions may arise, for instance, as to whether a person can be transported to hospital on Shabbat, and whether someone in the family can go with him or her.

"Many people simply do not understand the halachahs of how to deal with emergencies, and so they would sooner call Hatzoloh than 911," he said.

At the moment, Hatzoloh only operates between Sheppard and Eglinton avenues and between Avenue Road and Dufferin Street. Plans are being made to expand service up Bathurst to Thornhill as soon as enough volunteers are available and trained.

The organization also wants to offer community education programs, such as CPR and first aid techniques. It plans to sell neon street numbers at wholesale prices, and already has stickers with their emergency phone number, to be put on the telephone.

One should not fear that if one calls Hatzoloh, it will result in poorer care from regular emergency services. Kuhnreich noted that frequently by the time an ambulance or paramedic unit or fire department arrives, Hatzoloh volunteers have stabilized the patient, obtained a complete history, contacted family and generally calmed everyone down.

In fact, Ron Kelusky, acting general manager of Toronto Ambulance, wrote in a letter to Toronto Ambulance supervisors and crews: "I have committed that this department will work with them as partners in community medicine, and develop interactive protocols to ensure appropriate response and quality service."

The emergency phone number is 780-9991. For information, or to get the stickers, call 780-1484.

Haredi/secular conflict in Israel heats up

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — If the High Court of Justice does not stop its involvement in religious affairs, there will be war, the organizer of Sunday's haredi demonstration against the court threatened after the rally ended.

More than 250,000 people attended the demonstration, while another 40,000 attended a counter-demonstration in support of the court, according to police estimates.

"If after this demonstration, the High Court is not convinced to cease involvement in church-state issues, there will be war," said demonstration organizer Menahem Porush. "The people who were here are ready to invade any space."

Porush attacked Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi for his participation in the counter-demonstration, saying he "betrayed us."

MK Moshe Gafni, secretary-general of Degel Hatorah, also said he hoped the demonstration would prove effective. "A democratic country cannot ignore 300,000 to 400,000 people taking to the streets," he said. "If it does, there will be a terrible situation here."

"The demonstration was a springboard, not an ending point," added demonstration spokesman Dudi Zilberschlag. "If the demonstration doesn't help, we will get two million signatures on a petition and continue the battle to end judicial activism."

Some 2,000 policemen were brought into Jerusalem to ensure order at the demonstrations. Besides one attempt by 10 students to demonstrate immediately opposite the Haredim – which was quickly dispersed – both demonstrations went off peacefully.

Almost all of those who attended the anti-court demonstration were Haredim, though a smattering of national religious demonstrators could be seen.

The demonstration, at the old central bus station in Jerusalem, overflowed its boundaries, and many people were forced to climb on roofs, balconies and even pillars – sometimes at the risk of their lives – to get a better view of the dais.

Demonstrators arrived on foot from all over Jerusalem, and on buses from all over the country. All of the haredi sects were represented. Even members of the anti-Zionist Toldot Aharon sect, which normally boycotts such events, participated.

Virtually all leading haredi and national religious rabbis attended, including Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef; Gur Rebbe Yaakov Alter; Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv; Belzer Rebbe Yissachar Dov Rokach; Vishnitz Rebbe Moshe Hager; Chief Rabbis Yisrael Lau and Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron; and former chief rabbis Avraham Shapira and Mordechai Eliahu, now the spiritual leaders of the National Religious Party.

The demonstration was also a media event, with dozens of television crews from all over the world in attendance. The organizers set aside a special place for the press on one of the roofs, but so many people attended that the improvised press box was soon taken over by demonstrators.

The crowd bore placards with slogans such as Enough Incitement and The High Court is Dividing the Country.

The demonstration opened with a prayer, followed by the recitation of psalms. It reached its climax an hour and a half later with the responsive recitation of the Shema Yisrael, and closed with the sounding of dozens of shofars.

Afterward, demonstration organizer and acting Agudat Yisrael chair Menahem Porush, read out a resolution calling for an end to incitement against the haredi population, and appealing to the court to stop intervening in religious affairs. The resolution also said the Haredim will

U.S. threatens to close its embassy in Damascus

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — At the end of last week, the United States threatened to recall its ambassador from Syria, after Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas lauded the mobs that had attacked American facilities in Damascus in mid-December, at the height of the Desert Fox military initiative against Iraq.

Tlas's statements to the official newspaper Tishrin, which reflects government thinking, infuriated the U.S. State Department. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright telephoned Syria's ambassador in Washington, Walid Mualem, to bitterly protest Tlas' statements.

Albright told Mualem that unless Syria apologized for the boorish statements, the United States would recall its ambassador from Damascus.

A senior American official confirmed to Ha'aretz that the United States had lodged an official complaint with the Syrians, protesting Tlas' "scandalous and disgraceful" utterances. The official protest was delivered to the Syrian ambassador in Washington and also directly to the Syrian foreign ministry in Damsacus. "We clarified to the Syrians that we are considering taking the appropriate steps," the official said.

The Americans, who expect an answer from Syria soon, said they are treating the matter with the utmost seriousness.

Violent mobs attacked and stoned the American embassy and the ambassador's home (as well as the British embassy) in Damascus, to protest America's attacks on Iraq. The damage to the facilities has been assessed at about $500,000 (US). Ha'aretz has learned that the U.S. Marines guarding the facilities were taken by surprise and were forced to use tear gas to repel and disperse the mobs.

During the attack, Christine Crocker, wife of U.S. Ambassador Ryan Crocker, was alone in the official ambassadorial residence, and had to barricade herself in one of the rooms in fear for her life. The mobs shattered the windows and burst into the house, smashing furniture and other objects.

A source in Washington said there could be little doubt that the attacks had been approved by the Syrian authorities. "Such things don't happen by coincidence, especially not in Damascus," the source stated. One of the telltale signs, the source said, is the fact that although the incident was serious, no Syrian security forces showed up, although they usually maintain a presence in the quarter where the embassies are located. Another source noted that a nocturnal parade of that kind throughout the city "couldn't have taken place without governmental approval, pure and simple." The attacks were even filmed and the images broadcast on Syrian national television.

At the time, Ambassador Crocker registered an official protest. Deputy Secretary of State Thomas Pickering summoned the Syrian ambassador, who gave him a long lecture. Paradoxically, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al Shara expressed regret for the incident, but claimed the whole thing had been "spontaneous."

Pickering said at the time that he almost called the Syrian ambassador a liar. He added that the United States expected full compensation, and claimed that the Syrian police had joined the furious mobs. "It wasn't a marginal or negligible incident," Pickering said.

The American Foreign Service was also criticized for its inability to deal with the situation properly, and for responding to the Syrian outbreak with cowardice. Popular columnist Willian Safire wrote in the New York Times that the Damascus incident was the worst invasion of American territory since the invasion of the American embassy in Iran by students. Conservative Senator Jesse Helms, head of the Senate's foreign relations committee, indicated he intended to hold a Senate hearing to determine who was responsible for the affair.

continue their war against the Reform and Conservative movements. Afterward, organizers expressed satisfaction with the results.

"The Torah will win," declared Rabbi David Yosef, who was the first to call Chief Justice Aharon Barak the "enemy of the Jews."

Dudi Zilberschlag, the demonstration's spokesman, said, "We will undermine the legitimacy of the Supreme Court. Everyone will understand that they have to...live with us in peace."

The counter-demonstration in support of the court, – which took place in Jerusalem's Gan Sachar, about half a kilometre from the haredi demonstration – was characterized by loud calls for the separation of church and state. This call was repeated by speakers, including Meretz leader Yossi Sarid, Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg, Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan and Centrist party candidate Roni Milo. Organizers said they were pleased with the success of the demonstration, having expected only 20,000 people. Thousands of students complained that they were unable to attend because of the lack of buses.

In addition to high school and college students, participants included academics, representatives of the Reform and Conservative movements, and politicians. They bore signs such as "I am a Jew who believes in democracy."

Eitan called for the major parties to unite against the Haredim, and Gesher leader David Levy also spoke in the judges' defence. But the left-wing attendees only applauded for those on their side of the political spectrum. The nadir was hit when Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi ascended the dais and was greeted with catcalls. Only strenuous efforts by the organizers quieted the crowd enough to let him speak. During the demonstrations, several Jerusalem streets were closed.

May 17

• Allies of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu fared worse than expected in the Likud party's primaries, prompting some Likud officials to call the results a slap in the face to the prime minister. Likud veteran Moshe Arens, whom Netanyahu had described prior to the primary as part of his "leading team," ranked 26th in the party's list of Knesset candidates. Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon dropped several slots to eighth place.

• Fifty-five political parties are expected to take part in the upcoming elections. The total was announced when the deadline passed for registering parties to take part in the vote for the 15th Knesset.

• The Meretz party re-elected Yossi Sarid to head its list in the elections. Current Knesset members Ran Cohen, Chaim Oron and Amnon Rubinstein took the next three slots on the party's list.

• The daughter of slain prime minister Yitzhak Rabin joined Israel's still-unnamed centrist party headed by former defence minister Yitzhak Mordechai. Dalia Rabin-Philosof, a lawyer, will run in the party's sixth slot in the elections.

The struggle for peace without King Hussein

By ILAN GEWURZ

Guest Voices

"As long as I live, I will be proud to have known him and to have worked with him as a brother and as a friend. I commit myself to continue to do my utmost that we leave a similar legacy. And when my time comes, I hope it will be like my grandfather's and like Yitzhak Rabin's."

These were the closing words of the late King Hussein's address at the funeral of the late Israeli prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin. Now, "his time" has arrived, and in Israel he is indeed being remembered, not only as a great leader, but as a symbol of the struggle for peace.

King Hussein and Yitzhak Rabin, signing peace documents, during more optimistic times. [RNS]

However, I believe that real questions lie not just in the legacy he leaves behind, but in the challenges that his life and subsequent death pose to the populations living in the aftermath of his rule.

In the heart of Tel Aviv at the site commemorating the assassination of Rabin, a memorial service was rapidly organized in memory of King Hussein. Candles were lit and a video that had been prepared in advance recapturing his life was shown, with special emphasis on his commitment to and achievements in the realm of peace.

A book of condolences, open for all passers-by to write in, was put together to be sent to the royal family from the citizens of the State of Israel.

However, the subtle hidden message, latent yet ever too relevant, behind the loving appreciation for a great leader and expressed commitment to the continued struggle for peace, was the deep despair and sense of hopelessness of a nation bereaved of leadership and vision.

Israel is a country that has seen numerous wars; its citizens have lived through countless challenges and many difficult periods. However, throughout, there has always been a deeply embedded belief, or perhaps hope that "all will turn out for the best." There was always a sense that wars could not go on forever, that at some point after all, the hostility would be over, and peace would remain as the only possible existing reality.

Today that sense of hope, the belief that longing for peace is not entirely in vain, seems to have died along with the leaders who have come to symbolize that vision. It is this attitudinal change, the lack of faith stemming from an inability to remain hopeful and build upon the legacies of those leaders who were committed to peace that leaves an overwhelming sense of directionlessness among this country's citizens.

It seems as though the passing of great leaders such as Rabin and Hussein has not merely left a legacy of their commitment to peace, but has created a paralysis, an inability to envision an optimistic future without them. The idealization and mythification around these truly great men has left talk of peace largely directed towards the achievements of the past. The danger in this process is that it leaves the people with a deep sense of despair and little motivation to actively pursuit any type of vision of peace.

"Since 1995 I have wanted to meet you," writes one young Israeli woman in the book of condolences, "and tell you how much I love you and your way of peace. I always believed that I would get the chance to meet you and it makes me want to cry to think that I will never get the opportunity. So now, all I can say is goodbye."

Through the remembrance and mourning of this great figure, the feeling of disarray and frustration which exists among Israelis can be felt in the air. "Great men of peace," one man writes. "So lonely is the world without you both."

For Israelis, the death of Hussein seems to fit right in with the sentiment of having lost any real vision of peace. They continue to mourn a peace that no longer seems possible, a vision that no longer seems attainable, a dream that no longer seems plausible and a hope that no longer succeeds in instilling faith, optimism and drive towards activism in the hearts of this country's youth.

The real challenge that Israelis face today after the passing of another great symbol of peace, is how to build upon the achievements of the past and re-inspire the citizens of this country. For without a dream to look forward to, without a vision to believe in, how can the struggle towards peace continue and how can the legacy of great leaders truly be kept alive?

Jordan's King Abdullah planning close ties with Israel

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — One of the first acts of Jordan's King Abdullah will be to authorize the resumption of strategic cooperation with Israel.

This will include the restoration of full-scale intelligence cooperation, according to well-placed sources in Amman quoted by the Foreign Report newsletter.

This is expected to lead to the reopening of an Israeli intelligence station in Amman – described as a "gold mine" for officials with Mossad, the Jewish State's foreign intelligence agency.

Abdullah is also reported to be ready to renew strategic understandings, such as the late King Hussein's secret agreement during the 1991 Gulf War granting the Israeli air force the right to fly over Jordan, if necessary, en route to Iraq.

In exchange, Israel will provide a written commitment not to conduct any operations in Jordan, such as the botched Mossad attempt in September 1997 to assassinate Hamas official Khaled Mashaal in Amman, a move that prompted

King Abdullah

Hussein to shut down the Mossad station.

The London-based newsletter reported this week that Efraim Halevy, who heads Mossad, met his Jordanian counterpart, Samikh Batikhi, after Hussein's funeral and that they agreed to hold further talks.

It also reported that the resumption of deep strategic cooperation is the result of past secret contacts between Abdullah, then a major general commanding Jordan's Special Forces, and former Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, now a candidate for prime minister in Israel's May elections.

According to the newsletter, Mordechai delivered a favorable report after secretly visiting Amman at the request of Hussein to observe the training of Jordan's special forces units and to assess Abdullah's military abilities.

Abdullah made a reciprocal secret visit to Defense Ministry headquarters in Tel Aviv as Mordechai's guest last year, before his father's health deteriorated, and later urged his father to reinstate the special strategic relationship with Israel.

"Now that Abdullah is king," said the newsletter, "he will do this himself."

It is also expected that Turkey will tie itself more closely to the Israeli-Jordanian strategic understanding through three-way, counter-terrorism exercises and the assignment of Turkish liaison officers to join their Israeli and Jordanian counterparts.

IDF approves strategic plan

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraph Agency

LONDON — A recently approved strategic plan for the next century will give the Israel Defence Force a global reach, according to the London-based newsletter Foreign Report.

The plan – described by the newsletter as "ambitious, extraordinary and radical" – will enable the IDF to deal more effectively with international terrorism and with potential threats from such countries as Iran, Pakistan and the former Soviet republic of Kazakhstan.

According to the report, the IDF will build a strategic command to deal with the threats rather than rely on creating ad-hoc forces to deal with emergencies as they arise.

The new command, which will be headed by a general who reports directly to the army chief of staff, will be constructed in four stages.

The first will involve the creation of an intelligence infrastructure in countries that do not border Israel – a massive operation that will involve the installation of eavesdropping devices and other monitoring systems, as well as making preparations for electronic warfare and computer espionage.

This task would normally be handled by the Mossad foreign intelligence service, but the strategic command will turn the project over to Israel's military intelligence service, Aman, according to Foreign Report.

The second stage will involve the gathering of intelligence data from distant sources. This is expected to occur some two years after the first stage begins.

The third stage will involve building a force capable of operating far from Israel. A first step toward creating that force began with the recent delivery from the United States of a squadron of F-15I jet fighters, which is now operative.

The aircraft are bought "naked" in the United States and, after arriving in Israel, undergo substantial modifications, including the fitting of sophisticated Israeli electronic equipment, the newsletter reported.

The F-15I squadron is intended exclusively for long-distance missions by the strategic command, including a possible bombing raid against nuclear installations in Iran. The jets are capable of travelling to their targets and returning to base without the need to refuel.

At the same time, a special full-time commando force will be trained for strategic missions beyond Israel's borders.

In the fourth stage, the chief of staff will coordinate all the ingredients of the new command. These include intelligence data from Aman, as well as the training of F-15I air and ground crews and the army commandos.

Also at this stage, Israeli officials envisage cooperation with the United States and Britain through liaison officers.

According to Foreign Report, Israel believes these are the only two governments that share the Jewish state's security concerns – and are willing to fight terrorism beyond their frontiers.

Glaring gaffes mar movie

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Antoine de Caunes and Elsa Zylberstein in Man Is A Woman.

Man Is A Woman, one of the movies to be shown at next week's Cinefranco film festival at the Cumberland 4 theatre, rests on two shaky premises.

Jean-Jacques Zilbermann's romantic comedy, which takes place in Paris and in Brooklyn, turns on the improbable relationship and subsequent marriage between a gay, secular man and an Orthodox Jewish woman.

In real life, anything is possible, of course. But Man Is A Woman, which opens at Cineplex Odeon theatres on March 26, stretches reality beyond the realm of plausibility.

The protagonists are Simon (Antoine de Caunes), a musician who can play a mean klezmer tune with a clarinet, and Rosalie (Elsa Zylberstein), a devotee of Jewish tradition and religion, as well as a Yiddishist and a singer.

Rosalie, whose parents are Chassidic Jews, first catches a glimpse of Simon at his cousin's wedding in Paris. When Simon's mother coyly suggests that Rosalie is romantically interested in him, he archly reminds her of his sexual orientation.

Simon's wealthy uncle, a banker and Holocaust survivor who wants to perpetuate the family name, is undeterred. He offers Simon 10 million francs and a mansion if he drops his objection to marriage. And in a cynical aside, Simon's opportunistic mother reminds him that he can always divorce Rosalie.

Having set the scene, Zilbermann arranges for the young couple to meet. Sparks fly, she is smitten and Simon is hooked. Rosalie decides that her parents and Simon should meet.

At first, Rosalie's father, a cold, stuffy businessman, dislikes Simon. But eventually, he warms to him, as does Rosalie's brother Daniel, a self-professed homosexual who's estranged from Orthodoxy.

As Simon's involvement with Rosalie deepens, he confesses that he is a "total virgin" with women, but not with men. The bombshell doesn't seem to faze Rosalie, and the lovers are wed.

Man Is A Woman, which is shown with English subtitles and which explores universal themes like love and lust and deceit and acceptance, flounders on two counts.

What viewer can accept the farfetched premise that Rosalie, the product of a cloistered haredi background, lives without a chaperone in a foreign city and thinks and acts like a free spirit?

And, more to the point, how believable is it that a dyed-in-the-wool gay man can, even for a price, suddenly and sincerely enjoy a full heterosexual relationship?

In light of these glaring gaffes, how can one truly immerse oneself in this film?

Man Is A Woman will be screened on Feb. 27 at 7:30 p.m. For information about Cinefranco, call 928-6595.

Home Sought for Yiddish Books: Thousands of Yiddish books, currently sitting in storage at the Albert J. Latner Jewish Public Library in north Toronto, need a new residence.

The books, which belong to the Committee for Yiddish of the UJA-Federation, were packed in boxes a few years ago, when space at the library became too tight to display them. Now the boxes are becoming buried beneath other boxes.

"We're looking for a new home for the books, somewhere where we can display and use them," says the Committee's Bess Shockett. "We also need able-bodied people to move them and set them up on shelves." 635-2883 ext. 155.

A jury will choose the winning entry, which merits a $500 prize and a premiere performance as part of a larger program May 26 & 30 at Trinity-St. Paul's Centre, and June 2 at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The program also includes the Toronto Chamber Choir, the Trinity-St. Paul's Choir, the Lachan Choir, Benjamin Maissner, Milton Barnes, the Me-irim Dance Company and Shula Saltzman. For details, contact David Failla or Brad Ratziaff, 922-4954.

The 60-minute production captures a seldom-seen Landsberg with her husband, Stephen Lewis, and their three adult children. Friends and associates also recount the events and battles of her political activism and show how her crusades have elicited a public response, changed attitudes and provoked reaction from governments.

Landsberg also speaks about her battle with breast cancer in the mid-1990s, during which she found strength in gardening.

The program is being presented as part of a series of five shows about women, in celebration of International Women's Day, March 8. Four Women of Egypt is the instalment set to air March 5.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

JORDAN IN TRANSITION

With the world's eyes on Jordan last week for the funeral of King Hussein, I have occasion to recall my two extremely interesting visits to that country, once in the late 1980s and again in the late 1990s, after the lapse of a decade.

On my first visit, I rode into the fabled rock-carved city of Petra on horseback. That is no longer allowed, because of the increased numbers of visitors that Petra now receives daily.

On my return visit I couldn't help but notice the tremendous improvements that Jordan had made to its tourist infrastructure. The presently-stalled peace process had injected new life into the tourism industry, provoking a spurt of new hotels, restaurants, tour companies and other service industries.

Hydro wires were being strung up to bring electricity to some remote desert villages for the first time. Many hotels were being built, especially around Petra, an area that previously lacked the water resources to accommodate a rise in visitors. Improvements were evident at almost every site I visited. Among other factors, the peace agreement and open borders with Israel had invigorated the economy.

I travelled with a contingent of five Canadian travel writers who were official guests of the Jordanian government. Our guide was a Canadian woman of Jordanian descent, Sahar Jarrar, a representative of Royal Jordanian Airlines. Sahar and her husband had been close friends of the royal family and she had gone to school with the late queen. Connected to a powerful political family, she was a niece of a former prime minister.

In the late 1960s, as a Jordanian government official in Libya, she had been kidnapped by Libya's Khadafi regime and imprisoned for months as a political pawn. Sahar, in short, had stories to tell. She seemed to know everybody, and gave us many introductions to people who would otherwise have been inaccessible.

Geopolitically, Jordan redefines the phrase "between a rock and a hard place," as I learned in talks with government ministers. The Hashemite Kingdom's relations with Syria are far from neighborly, and are often deeply problematic with Iran as well.

Despite our obvious political differences, which we chose not to explore, Sahar persuaded me of Jordan's good will towards the peace process. If Jordan has extended a hand in peace to Israel, it is because it is reaching for something it genuinely wants.

Since the trip was co-sponsored by the Israeli Ministry of Tourism, after the Jordanian segment we crossed at the Arava border crossing near Aqaba-Eilat, and spent several days in Israel. Perhaps Sahar detected a complementary sense of good will underlying the supercharged political atmosphere in Israel, which she was visiting for the first time.

Among Israelis, some pundit has commented, King Hussein was so well respected that he could have been elected prime minister. His successor, Abdullah, says he will continue the peace process endorsed by his father, a good sign for the long-term stability of the region.

I look forward to returning to the beautiful country of Jordan some day.

El Al seeks an end to Shabbat restrictions

BY ZOHAR BLUMENKRANTZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — El Al has petitioned Israel's Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein to cancel the restrictions precluding it from operating on Shabbat and Jewish holidays.

Company CEO Joel Feldschuh and chairman Joseph Ciechanover told El Al's board of directors last week why the airline wants to end the ban on breaching the Sabbath, which dates from 1982.

Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom intends to allow other carriers to compete with El Al, but Rubinstein had stated that these airlines could not be proscribed from operating on Shabbat. El Al's board concluded that the airline has to resume operations on Shabbat in order to remain viable.

Meanwhile, KAL chairman Arye Nehemkin called on Yahalom to immediately open the aerial cargo transport sector to competition. He promised that the company would not fly on Shabbat.

Remembering the master of klezmer

By ERIC STEIN
Special to the CJN

On Feb. 14, a significant milestone of Jewish cultural life passed without much notice. On that date, 10 years ago, the legendary clarinetist Dave Tarras died at 91.

Tarras is recognized by musicians and scholars as one of the most important innovators of 20th century Jewish music. It was largely from his style that what we know today as modern klezmer music developed.

Tarras was born into a family of musicians in Ternovka, Ukraine, in 1897. He began formal music lessons at an early age, showing immediate talent on the balalaika, mandolin and flute. In his early teens he discovered his true musical voice in the rich sonority of the clarinet.

In 1921, Tarras emigrated to America. At Ellis Island, he watched in horror as customs officials destroyed his instrument with a routine fumigation.

In retrospect, it was a small price to pay, for Tarras was among the last lucky few to arrive before the U.S. government introduced immigration restriction laws and by 1924, had completely suspended all Eastern European immigration to America.

Tarras settled in New York and spent a year working in the fur trade before he purchased a new horn. He soon took a few small jobs playing weddings and other simchahs, entertaining immigrant Jews hungry for the sounds of the "old country." But he had still yet to realize his musical gifts would provide him a career.

At that time, New York's self-appointed "King of Jewish Music" was the brilliant but undisciplined clarinetist Naftule Brandwein. Brandwein's fabled virtuosity was surpassed only by his outrageous antics, volatile personality and taste for alcohol.

After seeing Brandwein perform, Tarras had an epiphany. As he later recalled: "I heard Naftule play – it was a good experience. I figured if he's a star, I can do better."

Becoming a fulltime musician, Tarras soon supplanted Brandwein as the top Jewish clarinetist on the scene. Bandleaders like Joseph Cherniavsky, Abe Schwartz and Alexander Olshanetsky preferred Tarras' cool professionalism, refined technique and excellent sight-reading abilities to Brandwein's unpredictability and lack of formal skills.

Tarras' timing could not have been better, for the Depression and war years would be the golden age of Yiddish music in America. He rapidly became a top-draw on the "Borscht Belt", the circuit of hotels and resorts in the Catskills mountains.

Back in the city, Tarras became a fixture in the Yiddish theatre, playing for hundreds of productions and backing such legendary performers as Aaron Lebendeff, Molly Picon and Seymour Rechtzeit. As demand for his services grew, and as composers began writing with his talents in mind, the Tarras "sound' in many ways came to define Yiddish theatre music.

Tarras' recording career also took flight. As a leader, featured soloist, or section-player, he would eventually appear on more than 500 records, often uncredited.

Listening to the recordings made at the pinnacle of his career, Tarras' virtuosity is unmistakable. These records sound as alive and exciting today as the day they were recorded. Tarras plays with both passion and control; his tone is rich, his phrasing lyrical and inventive. His astounding precision makes the most complex passages sound effortlessly smooth.

His original compositions and contemporary arrangements of old-world melodies also testify to his genius. As none other before him, Tarras updated the style and repertoire of Jewish music that had been brought over from Europe, turning it into a thoroughly Americanized form, yet no less authentically Jewish.

In the decades after WWII, however, Tarras' career slowed as the audience for heymishe Yiddish music shrunk. The twin effects of Americanization and prolonged immigration restrictions had left the Borscht Belt and Yiddish theatre in decline. First-and second-generation descendants of the immigrant generation were simply less interested in Yiddish music, identifying more with American styles like jazz and later rock and folk.

Tarras and his contemporaries attempted to adjust to these shifts by mixing swing rhythms and complex jazz orchestrations with the Yiddish style. Some of these experiments resulted in highly sophisticated musical statements, like the brilliant 1956 album Tantz! (Dance)

Nonetheless, Tantz! and others like it failed to find a market. As Tarras later explained: "The stores said 'It's a good record, it's beautiful, but if it's jazz we want, we got Benny Goodman.' It's not Jewish cause it's mixing in too much jazz and it's not jazz cause it's mixing in too much Jewish." Tantz! was simply too far ahead of its time.

Though Tarras had little trouble finding work in the late '50s and '60s, he eased into a not-altogether voluntary retirement.

But in the '70s, resurgent interest in Jewish instrumental music, now dubbed "klezmer", inspired a massive revival of form. Tarras was at first amused by the revival. He puzzled over the term "klezmer", which in his day had been an insult referring, in his words, to "a guy that couldn't play – he could only scratch out a tune for the cheap goyim."

But whatever the term, Tarras appreciated his coronation as a living master. In 1979 he recorded his first album in years, and though by the age of 80 his skills had begun to diminish, he was once again in demand as a performer.

Tarras received all sorts of media attention in the last decade of his life and received numerous commendations. When he died, by his wishes, his clarinets were bequeathed to his protegé Andy Statman.

Dave Tarras' impact on 20th Century Jewish music is sometimes overlooked. His contemporary, Benny Goodman, is often thought of first when the subject turns to Jewish clarinetists. Though Goodman was himself a master, he built his career in jazz and knew little about playing Jewish-styled music. It was Tarras, in fact, who established the instantly recognizable sound of the Jewish clarinet.

Like very few others in the history of modern music, Tarras' legacy can be measured in the degree to which his own personal style and body of work has come to typify an entire genre. All the facets of his playing – his tone, phrasing, ornamentation, compositions and repertoire – make up the elements of a style that is more popular today, worldwide, than ever.

It is with good reason that Tarras has been dubbed the "father of Yiddish-American klezmer music." Fusing the centuries-old tradition of European-Jewish music with the progressive spirit of his adopted home, Tarras bridged the gaps between past and present, between Europe and America.

Orthodox Baltimore bocher a basketball prodigy

By STEVE LIPMAN
New York Jewish Week

NEW YORK — Even by Tamir Goodman's standards, it's been an unusual two weeks. There's the all-day studies at a Baltimore yeshiva, some basketball after school, homework, Gemara review – oh, and the interviews with CBS Sports, Fox Sports, ESPN and all the local TV stations.

Goodman, 17, is becoming a basketball star. The high-scoring junior point guard at the Talmudical Academy (TA), an all-boys Orthodox day school, recently made a non-binding verbal commitment to play at the University of Maryland (UM). He will sign an official letter of intent in November and be eligible to play for the Terrapins – ranked number four by USA Today – in the 2000-2001 academic year.

It's believed he would become the first Orthodox Jew to play major college basketball.

"It's exciting," Goodman said in a telephone interview, his voice weakened by flu brought on by twice-a-day media interviews in the last two weeks.

Since he started playing organized ball two years ago, Goodman, a lanky, redheaded honor-roll student, received some 400 recruiting letters from top teams around the country. He chose Maryland because it's close to home and has an active Jewish community.

"Why not?" he says. "They want me."

Goodman will receive an athletic scholarship, and likely pursue a career in sports medicine or physical therapy. UM coaches have indicated they will respect his Sabbath observance, attempt to avoid scheduling Friday night or Saturday afternoon games, and allow him to miss games on Shabbat.

The Maryland athletic department is barred by NCAA regulations from discussing prospective players. But David Zakar, a classmate of Goodman and creator of the TA basketball team's Web site, says a shomer Shabbat player in big-time college basketball "was a matter of time."

"The fact that Maryland would consider doing this is a tribute to their open-mindedness and to his talent," says Dave Kufeld, president of the Jewish Sports Congress and a star player on the Yeshivah University basketball team in the late 1970s.

Kufeld was drafted by the NBA's Portland Trailblazers in 1980 but was cut in the pre-season.

"This is more significant than my getting drafted," he says. "It could be a tremendous kiddush Hashem [sanctification of God's name]."

Goodman would become the first known Jewish player in Division I history to wear a kippah on the court or sit out Sabbath games.

"Until now it was totally unheard of – this goes beyond Orthodox Judaism," says Kufeld, a public relations executive in Manhattan. "This could be a landmark precedent of acceptance for a wide range of special needs."

At 6-foot-3 and 155 pounds, Goodman leads the Thunder in scoring with 36 points a game. His coach, Chaim Katz, says the team is made up of "one Division I player and 11 rabbis." Goodman also paces TA in assists, rebounds and steals.

"He's an excellent athlete, a great instinctive player," says Katz, who has known Goodman since he was an eight-year-old who would come to practices and pester the coach for playing time during drills. Even then, Katz says, Goodman could shoot free throws better than older players. He had Goodman practise with his right hand tied to his pants, forcing him to become ambidextrous.

"We knew this day [of Goodman receiving recognition for his skills] would come," Katz says. "I told my brother, Tamir would be the best religious player who ever lived. They laughed at me."

Most newspaper stories identify Goodman as one of the top three high school players in Baltimore, a city renowned for producing elite players and teams.

"He looks like Howdy Doody but plays like Pete Maravich," Katz says. "He surprises people."

"He has a lot of basketball savvy. He has wonderful moves," says a Baltimore Sun sports writer. "You don't see many 6-foot-3 guys who can dunk."

Tamir Goodman

Goodman, who has led his team to a 39-8 record the last two years, has meant bigger crowds at games in the TA gym, an upgraded schedule for the Thunder and higher visibility for the 80-year-old school.

New York fans will be able to watch Goodman when TA plays in the annual Red Sarachek Tournament March 18-22 at Yeshivah University.

For parts of the Orthodox community, which traditionally considers competitive sports bitul zman, a waste of time and distraction from Torah studies, Goodman's success has earned grudging support.

"Right now, he's a very big sensation. In the more modern [Orthodox] crowd it's a big thing," says a member of Baltimore's Orthodox community, who has a son attending TA. "They're downplaying it at the school. [Tamir] wasn't in the last newsletter," he adds.

At TA, Goodman says, he has become a reluctant celebrity. Teachers stop him in the hall to discuss the last games. "All of a sudden every rabbi is a coach."

For Goodman, basketball is a form of religious expression. "God's messenger," he calls himself. "Baruch Hashem, I have a lot of talent." He spent his freshman year out of town, at a Pittsburgh yeshiva with no basketball team. "I was miserable," he says.

Now he lifts weights three times a week to add muscle, and he's planning to attend a basketball camp this summer to compete against better players. A doctor assures him he will grow to 6-foot-6. Goodman wants to be all the basketball player he can be.

"Hashem gave me the talent," he says. "I could use it or not use it. I use it."

Tigers tame hoops foes

TORONTO — It was nail-biting time for fans of the CHAT Tigers at the recently concluded Israel Becker Basketball Tournament.

As if playing to a script, the host boys and girls teams advanced to the championship games over tough American competition.

The girls title game featured plenty of drama and put the fans at the edge of their seats as the Tigers battled a team from Ramaz High School in New York.

CHAT trailed in much of the game but as time wound down, the Tigers tied the score. Then with one second remaining, Shayna Greenwald landed a dramatic fade away jump shot to give CHAT a 46-44 victory.

In the boys final, the Tigers' awesome firepower negated the need for last-second heroics as they dispatched a team from Westchester High School in New York, 78-38.

Greenwald was named girls MVP while CHATnik Ami Warner was MVP among the boys.

Held annually at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, the tournament is named in honor of former CHAT student Israel Becker, who was killed in a car accident.

Twenty-four teams – 12 boys teams and 12 girls teams – participated in the event, including contingents from England, Montreal, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Miami and Atlanta.

The Inside Back

Judgments back patent-holders

Two recent judgments by Israeli courts on the issue of patents mark a victory for patent-holders, while harming generic manufacturers. The question of their impact on the public remains under dispute.

The cases involved famous drugs developed by large international companies.

The medications had been under patent in Israel, but the patents expired, and a local company began selling generic copies immediately.

Since it was clear that the development of a pharmaceutical product takes years, and that significant work goes into even a generic drug, it was apparent that the Israeli company had been working on them during the period of the patent, conducting experiments and manufacturing large quantities of the products.

The Israeli company's arguments boiled down to the claim that the day the patent expires, so does the protection. Forbidding such activities, it argued, would in effect extend the patent beyond the 20-year period set by law, since it would prevent them from "hitting the ground running" when the patent expired, effectively blocking competition for another few years.

This, it reasoned, went beyond what the legislature intended, and also harmed the consumer by preventing competition, which leads to cheaper pharmaceuticals.

The international companies argued that the protection afforded by patents actually benefits consumers. Since the development of a new drug takes years as well as astronomical sums of money, companies won't do it unless they are assured of recouping their investments and making money for an extended period of time. Allowing competitors to copy the products as soon as the patents expire, shortens the period during which the inventors can benefit from their investment, thereby making the development of new medicines less profitable. As such, the consumer will have less choice and health care will suffer.

The court decided in favor of the international companies. In both judgments, the court rejected the idea that experimenting, preparing dossiers for registration, and actually manufacturing the product during the period of the patent do not violate the patent.

The court reasoned that allowing such activities to go on would create a "springboard" for the competitor to launch the product immediately upon expiry of the patent, and that creating such a springboard is in itself a violation of the patent.

Economic legal theory sees patents as a kind of state-sponsored monopoly, since one person or firm is granted the exclusive right to make money from a product. Generally speaking, monopolies are thought to be bad for consumers, since the lack of competition leads to poorer quality products and higher prices. For centuries, it has been recognized, however, that society benefits from new technology, and that without a lengthy period in which inventors can reap the profits of their inventions, they will have no incentive to create.

It is true that no company in its right mind would invest the kind of money it takes to develop a drug, if a competitor could copy it the next day and drive the price down. What was not clear under Israeli law, was whether the prohibition against exploiting the product during the life of the patent included taking the steps required to be able to sell it after the patent runs out. These decisions removed any remaining doubt.

As in many countries, the Israeli health system is in crisis. The government has been taking steps to lower the cost of drugs by limiting their prices and considering allowing the parallel import of pharmaceuticals, i.e. not just by the registered representative of the manufacturer. Sales of generic drugs have also been booming.

While the Israeli court decisions may be perceived as going against this trend, they should not be seen in this context. The court's role is not to create policy or provide social benefits, but rather to interpret the law and, in the appropriate cases, protect property-holders from infringement.

One may disagree with both the reasoning and the result of these judgments, but for many, they are seen as a declaration that Israel enforces intellectual property rights and protects their owners.

Regardless of the effect on drug prices, this would seem to be an important message to foreign investors and other people considering doing business in Israel.

PURIM PINWHEELS

1/4 lb. margarine
3/4 cup sugar
1/2 tsp vanilla extract
1/4 tsp almond extract
1 egg
1 3/4 cups flour
1/2 tsp baking powder
1/4 tsp salt
1 oz. unsweetened chocolate melted
2 tblsp poppy seeds

In large bowl of a mixer, cream together margarine and sugar until light. Add egg, vanilla and almond extracts and blend well. Combine flour, baking powder and salt. Add flour mixture to butter mixture and blend thoroughly. Divide dough in half. Beat melted chocolate into one half of the dough, and the poppy seeds into the remaining half. Wrap each half with plastic wrap and refrigerate until firm.

On floured wax paper, roll out each half dough to 9"x14". Invert white poppy seed dough onto chocolate dough and peel off wax paper from white dough. Tightly roll up dough, jelly-roll fashion, peeling off wax paper as you roll. Wrap roll with plastic wrap and refrigerate at least 1 hour, or freeze until needed.

Cut roll into 1/4" slices. Place slices on ungreased foil-lined baking sheets and bake at 350°F 5-7 minutes or until lightly browned. Transfer to racks to cool.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I really feel taken advantage of, and my feelings for a once wonderful friend are beginning to sour. Here is the story.

Stacey and I go back to grade school. I married three years ago and have a baby. Stacey has become engaged and her wedding is in May.

She asked me to be one of her bridesmaids and I was thrilled. Even though money is a bit tight right now with a new baby and new mortgage, I knew I could scrape the money together to march at her wedding. What I didn't realize is there would be an engagement party which required a gift, a shower from her new mother-in-law which requires a gift, a shower from her sister which requires a gift, and last but not least, a wedding gift.

I think this is schnorring a bit too much and there is no way I can afford all this. If I lie and say I can't make it to the showers it will make me really look bad. Do you have any suggestions?

Gifts Galore

Dear Gifts Galore

I think you should take a step back and see what is really happening here. An engagement party is often thrown for a couple. The two showers will probably have different people invited. Stacey's mother-in-law to be, will invite her friends and maybe a few of Stacey's friends. As for her sister, there will be some overlap; however, most of the people at that shower will not be the same. Because of your long close friendship, you fit into the overlap crowd. Imagine how you would feel if you didn't get invited? It's sort of a catch-22.

Speak to Stacey and tell her you would love to come, but you can't afford to buy so many presents. You'd rather buy her one really special gift so she can remember you every time she sees it. Do you think Stacey will think any less of you? Of course not. I think she would just like to have you by her side. I bet many of the people, especially at her mother-in-law's shower, will be strangers to her and a comforting glance across the room from you is all that she might need that day.

Don't let a few gifts come between two long-term friends during such a happy period in Stacey's life. Be there for her and enjoy her happiness with her.

The irony that hurts most

One of the key dramatic devices in the story of Purim is irony. It weaves furtively through the narrative like an invisible stitch tying the disparate, patchwork parts of the plot, dialogue and character development into a compelling story about courage, survival, greed, jealousy and retribution.

Through its many sudden twists and Hollywood-style turns, the tense, edgy story is tightly held together by irony.

Indeed, the colorful and evocative drawing on this front page by 10-year-old Rachel Esco, depicts one of the most powerful ironies in Megillat Esther.

Haman, the villainous would-be oppressor of the Jews of Shushan is seen leading Mordechai through the streets of the city as Mordechai, wearing the royal raiments and the crown of the king, sits comfortably atop the royal steed.

Editorial

Haman, however, appears decidedly ill-at-ease leading the royal horse and its Jewish rider. To complete the humiliation, he must also advertise the king's deference toward Mordechai to the whole city by proclaiming: "This is what is done for the man whom the king decides to honor."

What the drawing does not convey, indeed cannot convey, is the irony that Haman himself defined the terms of his own embarrassment.

In the scene immediately preceding Rachel Esco's drawing, the king had asked Haman: "What should be done for the man whom the king wishes to honor?"

Swept up by his own vanity, Haman was incapable of imagining anyone other than himself as the object of the king's favor. Thus, he greedily and shamelessly prescribed nothing less than the maximum "royal" treatment for the honoree, even to the point of wearing the king's clothes, riding the king's horse and donning the king's crown. Typical of brazen, unchecked ambition, it defeated itself with its own excess and arrogance.

The ultimate irony for Haman, of course, was that he himself was hanged on the very gallows that he had erected in the bloodlust of his irrational, obsessive hatred for Mordechai.

Purim Shpiels in Brief

CANADA

Running On The Spot

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Council president My Sharona and Brith B'nai (BB) supremo Lawrence Change-of-Heart have announced they will vie for the seat of Gur Nicht South in the next federal election. It's not clear who will run for which party, "as long there is a party," the two community activists told a news conference attended by a lone reporter for BB's in-house Jewish Spittoon. "Besides," they added, "we hear there's a restaurant in Hull that makes a cholent to die for."

'Are We Lost?'

MONTREAL — City council has passed a resolution calling for changing the name of René Lévesque Boulevard to Rue des Rugelach. "Lévesque was okay, I guess," said Montreal Mayor Pierre "Swedish Chef" Bork-Bork-Bork. "But rugelach! As we say in French, these are geshmacht."

Hizzoner's Tsuris

TORONTO — Following last week's light rain showers, Mayor Lem Firstman called out the Canadian army. "Those rains!" cried the mayor. "They dampened thousands of lawns and caused those little rivulets in gutters! It was time to bring in the Hummers and Bisons." The army responded with two corporals and an umbrella for Firstman, who personally sustained moisture to his fur collar and needed to be hospitalized. The mayor arrived at Mike Harris Hospital last Thursday, and at last word, is still awaiting treatment.

ISRAEL

Last One In...

JERUSALEM — Israel's chief rabbis have finally reached agreement on one of the most contentious issues in the nation's history: From now on, each mikvah in the country will have two lifeguards, one each from the Ashkenazi and Sephardi camps. "We hoped to get people who didn't pass their auditions for Baywatch," said spokesperson Rabbi Shmuel Sidestroke, "but at least they come with their own noseplugs and flippers."

Exact Fare, Please

TEL AVIV — Bus drivers for Egged have reached a tentative agreement with company officials. The drivers have agreed to a one-year moratorium on rudeness, a move borrowed from the union for French waiters. "Ehhh, why not?" shrugged Yossi Yisraeli, a 20-year veteran of Egged. "This way, we build up and save the good stuff for next year. You! Get to the back!"

Outstanding sticking points between the drivers and the company remain. These include the wearing of sandals and shirts. Drivers demand them, while company officials say tourists want their drivers attired, er, casually.

Pass The Tums

EILAT — Israeli researchers have discovered that the hot sauce offered for falafel at many street corner stands actually kills most cold and flu bugs. "If you can get past the heartburn, you won't sneeze," said vendor Itzik Pipik.

WORLD

Steee-riike!

LOS ANGELES — Former baseball great Sandy Koufax injured an armed intruder in his home last Friday night. The onetime pitcher and Hall of Famer proved his hurling skills are still intact by heaving an oversized matzah ball at the man, who was arrested by local police. The intruder was unconscious for two hours; Koufax suffered a torn rotator cuff and will be on the DL for at least six weeks.

One Lump Or Two?

LONDON — Britain's chief rabbinate has given the green light for kosher scones. "Tea time will now be more complete," announced Rabbi John Waddington-Sheffield-Jones III. "Her Majesty, who makes quite the kugel, is very amused." The rabbinate will next focus on clotted cream, bangers-and-beans and other British delicacies.

'It's What Year?'

SOUTH PACIFIC — A Jewish U.S. Army officer whose plane was shot down by the Japanese over the Pacific Ocean during World War II has finally been found. Lt. Hymie Levine, now 75, was in good health after spending over 50 years alone on an uncharted, barren island. He did, however, build two small synagogues out of palm fronds, one Orthodox and the other Reform. Asked why he would build two synagogues, Levine said angrily, "One I went to every Shabbat, and the other I wouldn't set foot in if you paid me!"

You Can Never Leave

WALLA WALLA, Wash. — Irving Cohen now has the distinction of being the only Jew in this Washington state town. Two days after his arrival from New York, which he left "to get away from it all," Cohen received three reminders for his United Jewish Appeal pledge, a call from Jewish National Fund to update his tree purchases, two subscription notices for Jewish publications, a request to inspect his mezuzah and a call from his Aunt Bessie to "come for dinner, unless you want me to eat by myself. Again."

Just Another Election...

JERUSALEM — A total of 120 political parties have registered to run candidates in the May elections. There was a dramatic development just five minutes prior to the deadline for registering parties. Until then, 60 parties had been registered to run. The number doubled when 60 more signed up at the last minute. Explained the representative of the new Ze Lo Chashoov party, "We thought 120 was a nice round number, so here we are. You know, like that Yiddish expression, 'Bis hundert und zwanzig.'"

Because the number of parties running equals the number of seats up for grabs, Prime Minister Yahoo Netanbibi has his work cut out. In fact, polls show that one candidate from each party has a good chance winning his or her seat, meaning Netanbibi will have to knit together a majority coalition from parties representing the lone Jewish immigrant from Bhutan; a group of intermarried circus performers angry about their tent allotments; several irate hat blockers, and Motti, the guy who sells orange juice at the beach.

Late last week, Netanbibi flew to Italy to consult with electoral experts. "Hey, I'm ready to invite Motti into the coalition, as long he brings juice. But the unfizzy kind," the prime minister said.

Premier Harris takes scalpel to hospital delays

By JEFF ROSEN
News Editor

TORONTO — Ontario's provincial government today announced a groundbreaking program designed to end overcrowding in the province's hospitals.

Ontario Premier Mike Harris, standing on a gurney in one of the remaining emergency wards, said that the situation had become completely unacceptable.

To this end, he said his government would be overhauling the emergency wards.

"It's quite simple," said the prem. "Say you were born on March 25. That translates into 3-25. Well, you will now have access three times a year on the 25th of the month. And the good part of it, is that you can actually choose which month to enter."

Through this new system, Mike said that overcrowding and ambulance redirect is guaranteed to become a thing of the past.

He said that a new multi-million-dollar government body will be created to monitor the new system to ensure people are not pulling "switchies," and swapping allocation dates with their friends and neighbors.

The CJN has learned that part of this new monitoring system will involve posting armed personnel at all hospital entrances who will check all birth certificates and health cards. Those who successfully beat this armada and gain entrance to the hallowed medical institutions, will find their bathroom privileges cut off, said one nurse who preferred to remain anonymous.

Fending off criticism and bedpans tossed by hostile orderlies, Harris said that his government would not be without compassion, though.

He said that those suffering medical problems on days when hospital admission is "not a reality" will be redirected to a new centrally located government kiosk at Harbourfront to pick up a "do-it-yourself medical kit."

"You will be amazed at what this little baby will do," said Harris, who denied rumors that he harbors ambitions to be a doctor himself.

To further encourage the public to take health care into their own hands and not rely on the medical system, Harris said that anyone

Wiarton Willie was actually Velvel Wiartfogel

By BADANA PANZER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Consternation has erupted in the Jewish community at the news that Wiarton Willie, the weather-predicting groundhog, was actually born Velvel Wiartfogel.

"He changed his name when he entered the entertainment weather forecasting field," his tearful sister, Vanessa Goldenberger, told a stunned news conference.

According to Goldenberger, Wiartfogel grew up in a traditional family, in the heart of Bathurst Manor. "He went to cheder at Eitz Yoseph Beth Marmita Amerikanit," she said. "He even had a bar mitzvah. At least I think that's what it was. There was a great party, and an ice sculpture of Velvel in the centre of the head table, and carrots all over the room. Oh, and Velvel went to shul one morning and read something out of a really cool-looking scroll."

Velvel was always interested in the entertainment field, she remembered. "He used to stand out in the backyard and sing and dance and tell jokes and give pretend weather reports."

Realizing that he didn't have the physical stature that most show business personalities have, and that he was too short to be a leading man, he went to school to study weather. For a while, he worked for Vortmax Weather Consultants, a small private company.

"He used to say that they taught him everything he knew," Goldenberger sobbed.

But then fame and fortune hit. "He answered an ad to be a stand-in for Wiarton Willie. He was so good, that he soon took the top job."

She said that he really loved the job. "He used to start preparing for the big day just after Sukkot. He had a computer in his underground office, and he studied and collated reports from all over the world and through satellite. And of course, most important, he would call Great-Aunt Perele Gittele to see how her arthritis was. He used to say that that was the best predictor of all. Oops, I wasn't supposed to say that, was I?"

Reaction was swift. His manager, Walter Woodchuck, said, "Sure, I figured he was Jewish. Especially when he wore that little beanie on his head, and when he wouldn't eat one day in the fall. But hey, we don't discriminate up here in Wiarton. I figured if he wanted to announce that he was one of you chosen groundhog types, he would have."

Woodchuck pointed out that he gave Willie a respectful funeral. "We got him a first class coffin and had a really big wake for him. Everyone in town came to pay their last respects. Hey, didn't you see it in the paper? Listen, if we had known, my girl Bambi would have sent The Canadian Jewish News a front page photo."

After an exhaustive search, B'nai Brith failed to come up with any indication that Velvel had joined the local lodge. A spokesperson said that "Wiarton Willie would have certainly joined if there had been one. He would have been welcome. And if anyone in the town had given him any trouble, we would have been the first to make a fuss."

A Canadian Jewish Congress, Central region spokesperson claimed that they knew all along that Willie was Jewish, but, in accordance with their long-standing policy of dealing with issues quietly and behind the scenes, had kept quiet and behind the scenes.

Goldenberger was upset that her brother was buried in a non-Jewish cemetery, and wanted to have him moved to Shalom Pardes cemetery in Maple. A spokesperson there said that he wasn't sure that there were facilities for groundhogs, even Jewish ones. "I mean, being called a hog…

"If it turns out we have to make room for him, we will," the spokesperson said. "But we have to get rabbinic approval, of course."

Rabbi Shlomo Shmuel Levenstein, new president of the Fervently Frum Association of the Only Real Rabbis of Toronto, said that he would have to search the texts to check on that. "The question, of course, is whether he was really Jewish. Was his mother? And how about his great-great-great-grandmother? And did he have a bris? And who did the bris? And who catered? Was it a company under proper rabbinic supervision, or one under the paskudnyaks at COR?"

Rabbi Angus Carlton Rosengarten-Greenbaum, spiritual leader of the Ultra-Leftist Liberal Hebrew Congregation, said that his Worship Site would be proud to have Wiarton Willie in their cemetery, no matter what. "We know what it means to be left out."

Goldenberger said she was heartened by the positive reaction to her announcement and by the movement to eat carrot-filled hamantaschen in his honor.

Kotel gets divided into 70 subsections

By JORDAN MAX
Special to The CJN

Roving CJN reporter Jordan Max, who has just returned from a whirlwind tour of the Middle East, filed the following briefs:

JERUSALEM — After a mammoth debate in the Knesset, and following the threat of withdrawal from virtually every coalition party in the government, an 11th hour agreement was finally reached to divide up the Kotel to reflect the diverse religious perspectives of the Jewish people.

Accordingly, the Kotel will now be divided into approximately 70 subsections of varying proportional widths to accommodate mixed worship, Reform, Conservative (traditional and liberal sub-sections), secular Israelis (facing the falafel stand), atheists (virtual space only), agnostics (in Tel Aviv), religious Zionists, religious anti-Zionists, tourists (Jewish and non-Jewish), Very Important Machers (VIMS), vegans and vegetarians. However, details on whether the proportional division would be based on world population or based on actual users still remains in dispute.

TEL AVIV — El Al, Israel's national airline, announced that it was creating its first frequent flyer plan, called Protektzia. Under the plan, frequent flyers who are mothers-in-law will be rewarded by designating them as co-pilots, inviting them into the cockpit to give pilots free unsolicited eitzes (advice) on flying and parallel parking the aircraft, and by using their favorite recipes for in-flight meals.

TEHRAN — The Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) and the government of Iran formally announced this week that the CIS would be providing technical assistance to build a series of nuclear reactors for Iran, to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes. The plan was immediately hailed by Amnesty International, the Flat Earth Society, Peace Now and Israel's Meretz party as a welcome advent to world peace.

HAVANA — In a stunning move, Cuban President Fidel Castro visited a Havana synagogue for the first time since the revolution. He was overheard to remark that it was his first time in synagogue since his bar mitzvah, which placed him on par with a substantial portion of the world's Jewish population. He alluded to his childhood discovery that he was not a kohen or levi as the primary cause of his early teenage rebellion, which eventually led to his current occupation.

TIBERIAS — Kibbutz Dagim scientists announced that they have now bred and developed a gefilte fish. They explained that this was done through genetically splicing together four different types of fish, carrot and onion genes, and then raising the boneless fish in special brine ponds.

Kibbutz officials expressed confidence that, once patented, the fish would be a real time-saver for harried Jewish housewives preparing for Shabbat and yamim tovim.

JERUSALEM — With the final tally just in from the Israeli elections for the Knesset, it appears that a record 60 parties received two seats each. The challenge will be for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who was elected by the second run-off through direct election, to put together a stable coalition government within the next 60 days and nights. The prime-minister-elect immediately took off to Italy to seek advice from its prime minister on holding together viable coalition governments.

Rabbinical student has a real (computer) bug

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Reuven Fizzort is convinced he's a computer. The 24-year-old Calgary-born Masorti (Conservative) rabbinical student is suffering from Y2K syndrome and expects to crash on Jan. 1, 2000.

Canadian-born psychiatrist Marla Shirley, a former University of Toronto professor, has examined Fizzort and says he must be kept away from (real) computers until he has undergone treatment and can be reassessed.

Fizzort managed to access a modem – he insisted it was part of his fingernail – for an exclusive e-mail interview, during which he strongly recommended The CJN return to the use of typewriters and Linotype before the end of the year.

Shirley, an expert on delusions, has never seen a similar case.

Seated on her desk in her office in Droriata (a Jerusalem suburb near the Kotel), she maintained the condition is not contagious, but took a lengthy pause to reboot herself and apply fresh lipstick to her monitor.

Fizzort's condition has attracted much attention in the Israeli media. Last week, security guards were posted outside his room in a private psychiatric facility in Jerusalem.

Rumor had it, fringe elements of the religious right were planning a kidnap attempt in the hope Fizzort would not be cured and would bring down the whole Masorti movement with him.

Hospital delays cut

not using their total annual allocation will be rewarded with a tax cut of $5.

Opposition came swift from all sides.

Leaders of the province's other political parties both denounced the plan as an attack on the education system. The NDP said that those unable to count may have problems determining which day to report to a hospital.

The Liberals promised to look into the entire mess if they are elected in the next election, but refused to be drawn into a debate whether they would scrap the plan.

Meanwhile the Jewish community was divided on the issue. Orthodox leaders said that it was halachically unacceptable, while Reform movement spokespeople said since rules are changing all the time, they could not oppose change for change's sake. Conservative leaders said there were good and bad points to the plan.

However at B'nai Brith Canada, leaders were "up in arms" and vowed to take their fight to the highest levels.

It's a travesty, said their spokesperson, using the Gregorian calendar. Jewish people should have the right to base their hospital visits on the lunar or Jewish calendar.

Canadian Jewish Congress leaders quickly held their own press conference in a nearby surgery room. They promised to study the issue to lobby all the right people to ensure fairness for all.

Sephardic Kehilla Centre gets ready to open mikvah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The sages tell us that we should beautify the mitzvot, that we should make observing the laws of the Torah as esthetically pleasing as possible.

That is exactly what the Sephardic Kehilla Centre and design architect Richie Idels have done with the centre's new mikvah.

The mikvah will open officially on March 17, with a program including speakers, a video on the mitzvah of using the mikvah, an opportunity to tour, and lots of food.

It will be available for use the next evening, March 18.

Rabbi Amram Assayag, spiritual leader of the Sephardic Kehilla Centre and chief rabbi of the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario, took The CJN on a tour of the new facility.

The mikvah itself, the pool where immersion takes place, is a scene of eastern elegance. The marble and tile walls, in warm beiges and tan, surround a scrupulously clean pool, which boasts not one but two filters.

Over the mikvah is a dome, with a blue mosaic that was, Rabbi Assayag said, imported from Italy and put together piece by piece.

Scene of eastern elegance

There are five fully equipped bathrooms in which to prepare for immersion, all decorated with beige textured tile, as well as a room with a shower and a steam room.

"Steam is very popular with Sephardi women," Rabbi Assayag said.

Great care has also been taken with maintaining security, he explained. There will be a special access route through the parking garage, access from the garage directly into the mikvah area, and a camera outside the reception room.

These precautions also ensure tzniut, modesty, the rabbi said, as going to the mikvah is considered very private. Tzniut will also be maintained by having users exit through a different hallway than the one used by those coming in.

A special touch is the bride's room. Rabbi Assayag explained that it is a Sephardi custom that a bride going to the mikvah before her wedding is escorted by female relations and friends, who party with her when she is finished.

"This makes it even more special and significant for the bride," he said, "not only that it is a party, but that she has to take time out in the middle of all the hectic preparations to go."

There is no other mikvah in the city that has facilities to observe this custom, he said.

Rabbi Assayag said he has given special instructions for the staff to try as hard as possible to avoid making the mikvah an all-evening affair. "In some mikvahs, you have to wait two or three hours. That is very hard for women, to leave their kids when there is homework and [there are] other needs, and when they themselves are tired. We want it to be as swift and smooth as possible."

Taharat hamishpachah, the laws of family purity, mandate that a husband and wife may not have sexual relations during menstruation or for seven days afterwards, and before immersing in a mikvah. The woman must be completely clean before going into the mikvah.

Using a mikvah is not like taking a bath, the rabbi said. Part of the water in the mikvah is rainwater, and immersing is "like going into a well of living water. The rabbis say that any impurity (not just menstruation, but any impurity, for men too) can only disappear if one immerses totally in a space where the impurity cannot exist."

Rabbi Assayag stressed that the Sephardic Kehilla Centre mikvah is not only for Sephardi women, but everyone is welcome.

For more information on the mikvah, call the synagogue at 905-669-7654.

Education minister visits two Jewish schools

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He didn't say yes and he didn't say no, but last week's visit by Ontario Education Minister Dave Johnson to two Jewish day schools has left officials of Canadian Jewish Congress hopeful that government funding is not a dead issue.

Johnson spent a little over one hour touring the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and She'arim, a school for children with special needs. Children from Zareinu, a school for developmentally delayed youngsters, were bused to CHAT to greet the minister.

Johnson said he was extremely moved by the children from Zareinu. "You can't help but be affected," he said. "Coming here was helpful to me."

Congress officials said the invitation to the minister to visit the schools was aimed at sensitizing him to the situation faced in the Jewish school system. Following his visit, however, Johnson declined to make any funding promises. "I can't make any commitment in terms of special education," he said.

The minister said he would encourage discussions between the ministries of health, education and community and social service (Comsoc) with a view to considering health services for children in independent schools. "Certainly I'd be prepared to follow up in that direction," he said.

Funding education costs "is not on the [government's] agenda," he said. "What happens in the future is hard to predict. I really need to focus my energies on the public system. There's so much work to be done."

Approximately 90,000 students attend independent religious schools in Ontario, 11,000 of them in Jewish systems. Independent schools receive no government funding, while Roman Catholic schools receive full government support as a result of a bargain reached at Confederation.

Following a failed legal challenge to obtain equal funding, Congress, along with the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE), stepped up a political lobbying campaign.

At the same time, a grass roots parents movement has been attempting to raise the issue's profile in the Jewish community and to mobilize parent activism.

Henry Koschitzky, chair of OJAEE, a Congress commmittee, said "it's important for us to show the government the type of work we're doing, that we have a first class educational institution [despite] the conditions under which we have to do our work."

CHAT, he pointed out, was originally designed as an elementary school for 450 students. Today it houses 900 high school students, many of whom study in portables.

Stephen Freedhoff, past president of CHAT, said some of the school facilities, such as the chemistry lab, pale in comparison to those in the public system.

"As taxpayers, it's always bothered us. Many other provinces fund this type of school... why not us?"

British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Quebec all fund independent schools, as do 65 countries around the world, OJAEE stated in a news release.

Tuition at CHAT averages $7,000 a year, while parents of the 68 children at She'arim face a top tuition fee of $12,650 per year. Of Shearim's $875,000 annual budget, $360,000 comes from tuition, $117,000 from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the remainder is raised from donations, said She'arim president Gerry Goldberg.

Approximately 1,000 students in the Jewish day school system require access to health support services, OJAEE states. Among the services that are delivered free of charge to students in the public system, are speech language pathology, communication disorders therapy, nursing care and occupational therapy.

"There is no reason [the government] shouldn't go forward with health services," said Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

The minister's comments on education funding were "consistent with what we've been hearing from the government," Landy said. "We acknowledge that with the tremendous changes brought to the school system, they don't want to deal with this in this mandate.

"If they're re-elected, that excuse won't be satisfactory. At that point, there will be no reason why it shouldn't be on their agenda.

"No one in the government has said it is inconsistent with their philosophy of fair funding for every student," he added.

Johnson acknowledged he "understood the arguments... I understand they see an inequity."

But, "there are many inequities in the world. We can't solve all the problems overnight," he said.

The irony that hurts most

In the very first chapter of the Megillah, we have the foreshadowing of irony's crucial role in the emotion-charged events of the unfolding story. Vashti's banishment for having refused the king's will is intended, not only as a personal punishment, but also as a deterrent to all the wives of the king's realm, to ensure that "they all treat their husbands with respect, high and low alike." How deeply cutting then, the irony, of Haman's own wife's remarks to him at the end of chapter 6: "If Mordechai is Jewish…you will not defeat him; you will fall to your ruination."

Irony is the fulcrum on which all the critical events of the story of Purim are balanced. One inescapably concludes that its use is not merely literary but educational, intended to enable the readers to better understand that the ebb and flow of history is not always apparent on its surface. There are dimensions and repercussions far below the surface.

We, the Jewish people, throughout all the shining and dark days of our history, have always lived, certain that there are purposes we cannot always know and mysteries that we can only sometimes sense. But we have always taught that our life on earth is for seeking them out.

The story of Purim reinforces that certainty.

The survival of the diaspora community that lived in Achashverosh's kingdom was a result, not of serendipity nor of default, but of individual courage and collective concerted effort. The Megillah is quite explicit in emphasizing this point. Not fewer than five times in the narrative before the date set for the slaughter of the kingdom's Jews, does the Megillah use a form of the word lehakel, to gather together. The operative element of the term is the concept of together, the idea of union.

And at the most climactic moment of the story we read: "The Jews assembled together…to stretch out their hands against those who sought to harm them, and no one could prevail against them…" (Our emphasis) This, then, was the final irony of the story. The Jews were dispersed through 127 different lands of the kingdom, yet only through their resolve and commitment to stand together could they and did they prevail against the evil-doers intent on their destruction.

How terribly bitter and cruel the irony in some circles today, both in Israel and the Diaspora, that we, the Jewish people, have forgotten that fundamentally important message of Purim.

How terribly frightening and worrisome the development, in some circles today, both in Israel and the Diaspora, that we, the Jewish people, are ignoring Purim's singular, most powerful lesson: that the great strength and the full flowering of the Jewish people can only be realized when we stand together, not apart; when we are united, not tearing at each other's throat; when we look for binding common traits, not when we find startling, even upsetting differences; when we seek reasons to forgive, not when we seize upon reasons to condemn.

This is the irony that hurts most.

At the end of the story of Purim, we read that Mordechai "sought the good of his people and was a spokesman for peace among all his kinfolk." The rabbis did not intend this passage to be merely a description of the man. They surely intended it to be also a prescription for all men and all women. And by making it the concluding sentence, they surely also intended it be the last, most important thought we must carry in our hearts as we leave the synagogue after fulfilling the mitzvah of hearing the Megillah.

Used other sources to vet PA schools

A letter to the editor (CJN, Feb. 12) criticizes the fact that the interview with me in The CJN of Jan. 29 neglected to mention that our news agency uses Itamar Marcus at the Centre for Monitoring Peace as an important source for coverage of Palestinian schools. Indeed we do, and we pay Marcus for the service of his agency.

However, our news agency also relies on contracted staff and other resources that allow us to cover Palestinian schools and refugee camps. For that reason, we have hired Palestinian TV crews and Israeli journalists to conduct interviews of Palestinian educators and Palestinian Authority officials for the past five years.

In short, news agencies are never reliant on only one source of information in the preparation of news material.

The Centre for Monitoring Peace is to be credited for translating Palestinian textbooks and Palestinian Authority curricula. Yet it is our job as newspeople to see if these texts are actually being taught, and we have taken the time to witness their use in Palestinian schools.

Says views on circumcision remain suspect

Prof. Margaret Somerville gives an eloquent response (CJN, Feb. 4), to Dr. Joseph Berger's letter to the editor (CJN, Jan. 7), on circumcision. Unfortuantely, she says a lot of nothing, and one could still make troubling interpretations of her position from her closing paragraph.

All she really has to do is say a few words: "Medical ethicists have no business in religious matters."

Until she states this publicly, her opinions remain suspect, and concerned Jews like Berger will continue to believe that any opinion opposing circumcision has a hidden anti-Semitic agenda.

Letter from the editor

The front page of The CJN last week evoked a strong response among certain readers. I received some very strongly worded phone calls, some polite, some hostile. In one instance a hate message was left for me on our office telephone system.

The CJN was also denounced from at least one synagogue pulpit of which I am aware.

The angry response was triggered by the fact that we published only one photo on the cover of last week's issue, namely that of the 50,000-strong counter-demonstration in Jerusalem and not a photo of the 250,000-strong main demonstration. We were accused of bias and flagrant discrimination.

The callers with whom I spoke were not assuaged by my denials of bias. Nor were they persuaded that we did not discriminate against religious Jews by the fact that we highlighted the main rally in the blue banner at the foot of the front page and in the caption that accompanied the photo.

Nor were the callers moved at all by the reason that we published only the one photo. By deadline 11:30 a.m. Monday morning, we had received two photos of the Jerusalem rallies, one of each demonstration.

In my judgment, only one of the photos, that of the counter-demonstration, met our news and color criteria for publication on the front page. The photo of the main demonstration of course satisfied our standards for news criteria but was far below even our minimal color and esthetic criteria.

I have reproduced that latter photo in the accompanying space for readers to draw their own conclusions about its photoworthiness.

Precisely to avoid accusations of bias, and precisely to comply with the canons of ethical journalism, we did include the two very prominent references to the main demonstration on the front page, accompanying the photo of the counter-demonstration.

But to my chagrin and pain, these two front page references were not sufficient to prove the objectivity of The CJN's news coverage. Also to my chagrin and pain, none of our accusers attempted to ascertain the reasons for our decisions before levelling the accusation of bias and discriminatory treatment.

The CJN takes great pride in and spares no effort to ensure the accuracy, reliability and objectivity of its news coverage. We have set a very high standard for ourselves. It will never be compromised.

The editor.

Perspectives

The Synagogue in Tegucigalpa

By FRANCI WILLIAMS
Special to The CJN

The Jewish community in Tegucigalpa, Honduras, has been striving for years to keep the Jewish culture alive.

Now this unique community needs support from world Jewry because in November, its synagogue was destroyed by Hurricane Mitch.

After years of praying in different locations, the community had only recently secured a permanent venue for Shabbat and holiday services.

For the past two years, the congregation had poured its heart and money into the new synagogue.

But now it is completely destroyed, submerged under mud and water, with all its Judaica lost except for a sefer Torah which was salvaged and is now being repaired in New York.

The Jewish community of Tegucigalpa is very small and is shrinking, because there is a high rate of intermarriage and significant emigration to the United States and Israel.

They are a group of dedicated Jews who manifest enormous strength, determination and dedication to Judaism against great odds. Thus the preservation of the community requires perseverance and a commitment by its members to devote time and attention to Jewish issues.

And they have succeeded. On one level, they are a constituted, legal, non-profit community with elected officials, and on another, they are an extended family related by their love of Jewish life.

They have conducted services, led completely by their own members, and they are fortunate in having participants who have a good Jewish education.

Before procuring a permanent venue, they had held the services in a hotel. They never knew which room would be available to them from one week to the next.

As the hotel became busier, the congregation eventually ended up using the hotel bedrooms for their sanctuary. The hotel, however, had not charged for the use of the rooms.

Two years ago, with 1½ days to go before the High Holy Days, the hotel told the community there were no available rooms.

People had to scramble madly to make last minute arrangements.

The High Holy Day crisis was the turning point for the community.

Members ended up having services for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur in Rosario Hernandez and David Loste's house.

The following week when they met for services, Loste asked how many people felt that they could no longer go without a permanent synagogue?

When he put the matter to a vote, the response was unanimous. Members began their search for a permanent venue with two definite pledges of support – one was from a businessman in the community and the other was from the Bank of Israel.

They were finally on their way after years of stress and strain.

The very last payment on the shul was recently made by Loste, just before he left for a UN position in Ethiopia.

It was a well-deserved triumph and everyone shared feelings of pride and security.

But in late fall Hurricane Mitch struck the Central American country of Honduras leaving a trail of death and destruction.

The Tegucigalpa synagogue was one of many properties decimated by Mitch.

The Jewish community has fortunately received donations of Judaica from other Latin American communities (especially the Costa Rican and Mexican Jewish communities). But it needs money to rebuild.

Children at the community-supported shelter.

The Tegucigalpa Jews, besides raising money for the rebuilding of their synagogue, have started a fund for Jewish families who suffered as a result of the hurricane.

They also support a shelter for those people who lost their homes and possessions.

They are being housed temporarily in a school called the State of Israel. (Schools in Honduras are named in honor of countries that have shown support for Hondurans.)

The Jewish community is in desperate need of books that can be used for bar and bat mitzvah instruction as well as to teach Jewish heritage subjects to the children.There are about 15 children of all ages.

The community also requires books on conversion to help the women who marry Jewish men convert.

The gentile women who marry Honduran Jewish men tend to convert, while Jewish women who marry Honduran men generally convert to Christianity.

I must admit I fell in love with this community. I immediately felt at home. By the time I left, I felt as if I had been there for years and that I had been visiting family.

The community exemplified the concept of one universal Jewish family.

The warmth, humor and hospitality of its members were unbounded. We were taken out for dinner, invited to a Chanukah party, and we even attended the wedding of the community's president.

It was the first fully Jewish traditional wedding here in 20 years, with a rabbi flown in from San Salvador.

Everyone we met in this small community had a story, a unique history to share with us.

And they were all very affectionate. We revelled in hugs and kisses.

Meeting the Jews of Tegucigalpa was a wonderful experience that filled us with gratitude for being able to spend time with them.

We felt proud to be able to help them with a gift from their extended Jewish family in Toronto.

Opinions

Funding larger social needs

I would like to return to a topic I broached several columns ago in regard to a Jewish communal reaction to the larger social issues facing Canadian society.

The column was given the headline, "Act in the Face of This Need," and discussed the deep feeling I have that our organized community needs to take action to ease the distress of many thousands of homeless, addicted and abused fellow Canadians.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I received some wonderful feedback, both positive and negative, from my suggestion that federations in Canada should make room on their agenda for these needs.

On the one hand, I was given many examples of where institutions have acted: Out of the Cold, sponsored by a coalition of Toronto synagogues, other Jewish institutions and area churches; coat and blanket drives (one in my own synagogue); and contributions to community advocacy and support groups through Mitzvah Days and other forms of giving.

I mentioned several in my original column and I am sure there are many others.

I also received some critical comments, which I can boil down to: "We also support, as individuals, a lot of charities like United Way, but our gifts to the Combined Jewish Appeal are meant to enhance Jewish lives."

It was also pointed out to me that Jews support orchestras, galleries, theatres and recital halls, and universities across our country.

It is a point well-taken, but it wasn't my point. I was talking about a response that would represent the will of our entire community, expressed through the federations of Canada.

For years we have supported combined campaigns through our local federations which allocate money to our schools, community centres, family service agencies, arts and cultural organizations, and a long list of programs vital to our communal welfare.

The money also goes to relief of overseas communities in countries where Jewish lives are at risk, and for many years, to Israel – first for its upbuilding, then for rescue and immigration resettlement, as well as for social welfare causes there.

(It is a measure of the distressed relationships between Israel and North American Jewry that the New York City Federation-UJA has taken out full-page ads in the New York Times trumpeting its support of Israel-based Conservative and Reform programs. I take it that people are beginning to re-think their financial commitment to the state that would delegitimize them.)

But my concern here is not that argument. My concern is that while our communal institutions are always in need of federated dollars, we can surely find some space on our agenda to allow a concerted approach to larger social needs. Here is one way it could happen. I am sure there are many others.

In the past, our communities have raised millions for special campaigns, the most outstanding being Operation Exodus, for resettlement of Jews leaving the former Soviet Union.

At that time there were voices raised in doubt that our regular campaigns could withstand the power of such a campaign – surely people would just divide their standard gifts and the local campaign would suffer irreparable damage. It didn't happen. Operation Exodus raised millions in addition to our annual campaign targets.

Now there are all kinds of pressures on our charitable giving, but we, the most affluent Jewish community in history, still keep giving. I believe that we could do the same thing through a special fund to address our local communities' most pressing social needs.

In Toronto, for example, homelessness seems to be a major blight – a combination of draconian governmental attitudes towards the poor and a climate that kills. In Vancouver, there is a drug and AIDS epidemic taking over 300 lives per year and crippling thousands in our downtown east core.

I don't know what our other major urban centres would identify as their crisis points, but I am sure there is, in each community, visible distress.

I propose that in each community as a part of the regular annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign, there be a special appeal for a fund set up to marry Jewish dollars to wider societal needs.

We don't have to set up new social agencies. There are many groups already working with whom we could partner. No one would be asked to shift dollars from their regular gifts to non-Jewish causes. But with the success of Operation Exodus, we know that we can make the case for additional giving to help our neighbors.

We can have a Jewish response to poverty, drugs, illness, madness and death on our streets. Just as we, as Jews, have enriched our country in so many ways, we can do it again. Surely we owe our children, who will live with the problems we ignore, this gift.

Choosing Shabbat over Peres

Perhaps because of what I do, I have always admired the great speech. A well-crafted speech that uplifts and inspires the listener is a thing of true beauty.

I have heard some excellent speeches in my time. Putting aside the rather superb address my 18-year-old son David delivered in tribute to his father at the 1998 JNF Negev Dinner, the best speech I ever heard was given at the Hebrew University Faculty Club to a comparatively small group of individuals attending a Canada-Israel law conference.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

After an informal luncheon, Shimon Peres, then foreign minister, spoke about the prospects for a "new Middle East." His address was articulate and his delivery was impeccable. And his words – indeed, his dreams – were awe-inspiring. On that day, he spoke not just on behalf of the Medinat Yisrael (the State of Israel) but on behalf of am Yisrael – the people of Israel.

I have been present at other speeches delivered by Peres. When I heard he would be in Edmonton on March 19, I was naturally excited at the possibility of hearing him again. I looked at my calendar and discovered that March 19 was a Friday. There must be some mistake, I thought. How can Shimon Peres speak on a Friday night – on Shabbat. But as I found out, there was no mistake. Peres will be speaking on Shabbat Vayikra at a dinner event sponsored by Junior Achievement of Edmonton.

One cannot fault Junior Achievement for this. They made the offer to Peres, not knowing the problem his speaking on Shabbat would cause for members of the community. Peres accepted the offer, either personally or through his agents. He could have declined, but he did not.

His acceptance of the invitation to speak on Shabbat shows a lack of derech eretz – commonly understood to mean "sensitivity" – towards the Jewish community of Edmonton. Some members of the Jewish community would consider themselves bound by Halachah not to attend while others, even though they may not keep all the laws of Shabbat, would be uncomfortable attending.

After all, they have to travel to and from the event (it is not as if they would be driving to shul to pray with their community). The event includes a dinner, but it is not, of course, a Shabbat dinner. They are not sharing Shabbat dinner with their family. They are not in synagogue for davening.

For many Jews – both Orthodox and liberal – attending this on Friday evening would not only desecrate the Shabbat, it would destroy it. It is insensitive for Peres to speak at a time when Jews will have to choose between either hearing him or observing Shabbat. (Nor does my view of this change merely because Peres has agreed to help dedicate the community's new Talmud Torah school on the Friday afternoon.)

I know Peres is not an Orthodox Jew. This, too, does not alter my view that it is inappropriate for him to give a paid public address on Shabbat. His actions send a message that is "OK" for Jews to do this.

This is the primary message that is conveyed to non-Jews who may not understand the diversity of religious adherence which exists within the Jewish community. They may wonder, if Peres was not reticent about speaking on Friday evening, why any other Jew should be reluctant to do so, or, indeed, why Jews should even be uncomfortable about attending the event. Peres is insensitive in not understanding the ramifications of his actions on Jews in the Diaspora, particularly in small cities such as Edmonton.

Finally, there is at least one more difficulty associated with Peres' speaking on Shabbat. What message does his action send to our youth about a whole array of issues – the significance of Shabbat, the importance of community unity, the relationship between Israel, its leaders and the Diaspora, and even the seriousness with which we adhere to the basic principles of Jewish communal life such as derech eretz? Peres' speaking on Shabbat, however, is just the most visible example of a recurring problem.

When I was a youngster, the shul in Sydney used to distribute World Over Magazine to all the children in the Hebrew school. I remember how impressed I was reading that Gov. Abraham Ribbicoff took his oath of office wearing a kippah. And later, I was proud that Sandy Koufax would not pitch on Yom Kippur. It is important for leaders of the Jewish community, leaders of the general community who are Jewish, and prominent Jews generally, to understand that their actions have serious repercussions for members of their community – both individually and collectively. It is important for these people to adopt the principle of derech eretz.

So, on March 19, I will be at Congregation Beth Shalom turning Friday night into Shabbat. I'll welcome the Shabbat by singing L'cha Dodi. I'll have dinner with family, with my friends and fellow congregants. And I'll listen to words of Torah from our guest, Rabbi Elana Zaiman, because on Shabbat it is more important to hear her words than those of Shimon Peres.

Land of Milk and Honey?

The question in the title of this column was written on Tu b'Shvat, and naturally my mind turns to the land of Israel and its agricultural potential. Every reader of the Torah knows that when the spies sent by Moses to report on the condition of the Promised Land returned, 10 of them came back with a negative report. Still, they admitted, the land was flowing with milk and honey, and they brought back with them some of its fruit.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In subsequent centuries, and to this day, the expression "a land flowing with milk and honey" has signified the ultimate wealth of the land, like nectar and ambrosia in the Greek tradition. "Milk" stood for ample herds of animals, and "honey" for an amplitude of flowering plants from which bees extracted their sweet products.

But already some years ago, a leading ecologist in Israel, Noga Hareuveni, came to the conclusion that the traditional interpretation of the biblical text was open to another understanding. According to him, the spies underlined the negative nature of their report by stating that the land was overrun by wild animals and that honey production similarly was not controlled by prudent beekeepers. A race of huge people inhabited the countryside, they said, and their reference to milk and honey simply underlined the wild condition of the land.

But whatever the early understanding of the text, "milk and honey" came to mean the wealth of the country. Its fauna, and especially its flora, were once indeed extraordinarily rich, and Hareuveni set himself to create a modern enclave which would represent plants, flowers and products that the soil once yielded to its inhabitants. He established a park that has come to be known as Neot Kedumim, literally "ancient pastures."

Located on Route 443 near Modi'in and near the Ben Shemen forests, Neot Kedumim is today the symbol of Israel's search for ecological balance and preservation. A former president of the state, Yitzhak Navon, is the chair of the project and has lent his reputation to the spread of an idea that more and more Israelis are beginning to appreciate and embrace.

In former days, when my wife and I used to lead regular yearly tours to Israel, we never failed to visit Neot Kedumim and became acquainted with Hareuveni and his lovely expanding gardens. It was easy to be infected with his enthusiasm, and in the years since then, his idea has captured the imagination of many young people, both in Israel and abroad.

Somehow, Tu b'Shvat brings all this back to my mind. Judaism teaches that the treasures we have been granted by nature are a sacred trust to be preserved to the best of our abilities. It fans out from the Promised Land to every place where humans dwell. To me, Tu b'Shvat is the birthday of modern ecology.

First-rate documentary looks at Arab-Israeli conflict

Television, its vacuous programs and its Jerry Springeresque personalities notwithstanding, can be an exceedingly enlightening and educational medium. In this respect, I can think of no finer an example than last month's five-hour, two-part documentary, The 50 Years War: Israel and the Arabs, a tour d'horizon presented by that examplar of American public broadcasting, PBS.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Produced in cooperation with the BBC, The 50 Years War was thoughtful, balanced and riveting, combining compelling narrative, graphic film footage and revealing interviews with Israeli and Arab decision-makers.

The first topic to be covered was the 1948 War of Independence, which resulted in the deaths of 6,000 Israeli Jews, a catastrophic toll considering Israel's population at the time.

It's clear that the Arabs expected victory. "We thought it would be a pushover," said an Egyptian, Adel Salin, King Farouk's cousin. As it was, the Egyptian army advanced as far as Ashdod before being stopped in its tracks by the Israelis.

Yitzhak Navon, Israel's former president, suggested that the tide only turned after Israel received a supply of weapons from Czechoslovakia. The United States withheld arms from Israel, despite President Harry Truman's recognition of the nascent state. George Marshall, the U.S. secretary of state, was strongly opposed to Jewish statehood, and accused Truman of pandering to Jews.

In a new revelation, a prominent Palestinian broadcaster, Hazem Nusseibeh, disclosed that the Arab side knowingly broadcast a false report claiming that Jewish fighters had raped Arab women during the Deir Yassin massacre. This, he admitted, was "our biggest mistake," since it was an important factor in the exodus of Palestinians from their towns and villages in Israel.

In the early 1950s, Israel's prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, hoping to reach a peaceful accommodation with Egypt, tried to arrange a meeting with Gamal Abdel Nasser. Despite some hesitancy, Nasser authorized a senior Egyptian diplomat, Abdel Sadek, to conduct talks with an Israeli representative in Paris. From Israel's vantage point, the negotiations proved somewhat fruitful: Nasser toned down the barrage of anti-Israel propaganda and reined in Palestinian fedayeen in Gaza. But, as Sadek acnowledged, Nasser could not bring himself to enter into peaceful relations with Israel.

Amid these developments, Czechoslovakia, a Soviet client state, signed a massive arms deal with Egypt at Moscow's behest. As a result, the Arab-Israeli dispute became an integral component of the Cold War.

The 1956 Sinai Campaign, as Israel's war of collusion with France and Britain is usually called, gave Israel a 10-year respite. But in May 1967, the Soviet Union, the great ally of the Arabs, let loose a genie which sparked the Six Day War.

As an ex-Soviet diplomat recounted, Moscow, in a calamitous act of mischief-making, informed Nasser that Israel was massing troops on its northern border and preparing an attack against Syria.

After personally investigating the matter, the Egyptian chief of staff found nothing amiss. The Soviet ambassador to Israel, meanwhile, roused Levi Eshkol, Israel's prime minister, out of his bed in the middle of the night to accuse Israel of fomenting trouble. Eshkol, still in his pajamas, offered to take the envoy to the Syrian border, but he declined the invitation.

Now, more than 30 years after the event, the former Soviet diplomat confessed that Moscow's cynical maneuvers were designed to set off a war and alter the balance of power in the region in favor of the Arabs.

Shams Badran, the Egyptian minister of war during this tense period, said that Soviet rumor-mongering forced Nasser to send troops to the Sinai Peninsula and block the Straits of Tiran, flagrant acts of war which prompted Israel to mobilize.

The former Egyptian chief of staff claimed that Nasser did not want a war with Israel, but stumbled into it under domestic pressure and in the name of Arab solidarity.

Interestingly enough, the United States and the Soviet Union respectively urged Israel and Egypt not to strike first. The American president, Lyndon Johnson, doubted whether Israel was in imminent danger, and warned Eshkol not to pre-empt. Robert McNamara, the U.S. secretary of defence, believed that Israel would win a war within seven days.

As the tension mounted, Ezer Weizman, the Israeli chief of operations, advised Eshkol to strike. "You have the best Jewish army since King David," he said, in one of his typically blustery statements.

When it finally launched its offensive on June 5, Israel had left only 12 aircraft behind to defend its airspace. In a frantic warning, Jordan warned Egypt that Israeli jets were homing in on its airfields, but the Egyptians were unable to decipher the coded message!

McNamara said that the Soviet Union came militarily close to helping Syria fend off Israel's blitzkreig on the Golan Heights. Washington urged Israel to halt its attack, but Eshkol coyly ignored the admonition, his widow recalls.

Israel, we learn, was ready to withdraw from the West Bank and the Sinai in exchange for Egypt's recognition of its existence, but Nasser balked. According to Badran, he could not be seen to be negotiating with Israel, the enemy of the Arab world.

No sooner had the dust of the Six Day War settled than Israel was engaged in a guerrilla war with the PLO in the Jordan Valley. Initially, Jordan encouraged the Palestinians, a Jordanian general said. The Jordanians had second thoughts about their provocative alliance with the PLO, as militant Palestinians, spearheaded by George Habash of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, clamored for King Hussein's overthrow and masterminded a series of airplane hijackings with regional implications.

With civil war having broken out in Jordan, Syria dispatched a tank battalion to northern Jordan. Gen. Mustafa Tlass, the Syrian defence minister, claimed that Syria's intervention was benign, merely aimed at protecting Palestinians rather than invading Jordanian territory. King Hussein, willing to accept assistance from "any quarter" in his hour of duress, was relieved when the Israeli air force warded off the Syrians.

Being grateful for Israel's help, King Hussein, on the eve of the Yom Kippur War, warned Golda Meir, the premier, of Egypt's and Syria's intentions to regain the land they had lost in 1967. Not fully convinced that his information was correct, she disastrously failed to mobilize the reserves.

The 50 Years War also dealt with Anwar Sadat's historic trip to Jerusalem in 1977, the subsequent Camp David summit which produced Israel's peace treaty with Egypt, and Shimon Peres's 1987 attempt, nipped in the bud by Yitzhak Shamir, to co-opt Jordan into the circle of peace.

The Palestinian uprising in the territories, universally known as the intifadah, was analyzed at some depth, as was Washington's herculean efforts to bring Israel and the Palestinians to the negotiating table after the 1991 Gulf War.

The Oslo peace process, as well as Jordan's rapprochement with Israel,were the subjects of the final hour of this excellent documentary. Among those shedding light on these developments were the late Yitzhak Rabin, Israeli ambassador Itamar Rabinovich, the former U.S. secretary of state, Warren Christopher, and two Palestinian negotiators, Abu Alla and Abu Mazen.

In short, The 50 Years War was TV at its finest.

Discovering oneself

By LISA ABRAMOVITZ

Guest Voices

I grew up in a Jewish home in suburban north Toronto, an experience that has defined me both culturally and geographically.

My childhood was happy, and I consider myself lucky to have parents who were positive role models in my formative years. The values I learned from them were instrumental in shaping and influencing me later in life.

From my father, I learned persistence, and I benefited from his passion for life. From my mother, I understood and appreciated the act of charity and giving back to the community. Armed with these valuable lessons, I came into my own and discovered my true self at 25.

In 1989, I was able to fulfil a dream when I travelled abroad alone. After many wonderful, eye-opening and culturally rich experiences, I returned to Canada a veteran of the world. My wide-eyed idealism transformed into responsibility, and I became actively involved in global social and environmental causes. So powerful was my desire that I pursued graduate work for the next three years in areas that would help me further understand these issues.

Now as 1999 unfolds, I've been taking stock of my life to date: my travel experiences abroad, my exposure to academic ideas and my desire to constantly challenge myself. I pose questions that beg to be answered. What lessons have I learned? What path do I now take?

Over the years, I've stretched my mind, and now I struggle to find a physical and emotional place in the Jewish community of my youth. But the personal inventory of my life has left me feeling somewhat estranged from friends who married high school sweethearts, had children and planted their roots five minutes from their childhood homes. This is not my destiny.

To compound matters, my mother relentlessly searches out new suitors for me. But in her attempt to play matchmaker, she only focuses on the fact I am now 35 and still single. She does not see the type of person I have become: determined, free-spirited and passionate about the larger world around me.

My life can no longer be contained within the cultural and geographical boundaries of the world I grew up in. And in my attempt to date, I go out in the hopes of seducing fate. I have my latte. We talk. I reflect. He listens.

But what I actually hear is how different I sound from what family and friends define as "typically" Jewish. I constantly tell suitors I could be just as happy living in a mud-floor, thatched hut as they would be living in a modest bungalow in the 'burbs.

To this they reply: "Good luck."

Perhaps, I think afterwards, I have been too strong in my convictions. But I come home feeling exasperated, and I wonder if I am perceived by others as a square peg trying to fit into a round hole. Could I be clinging to the desire to roll up my sleeves and make the world a better place? Or am I simply fighting the domestic, suburban lifestyle that has eluded me for so long?

I'm starting to realize that parading around with a non-conforming appearance may simply reflect a well-roundedness, so to speak, a worldliness, though in my quest for personal reconciliation, I still would like to find my destiny.

The next time my mother sets me up on a date, I'm hoping he will at least fit into my ever-changing and evolving world.

Time to enjoy Purim treats

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When Jews observe the most joyous holiday of the calendar next week, they'll be doing a lot of their celebrating through the preparing, eating and of course, sharing of food. So today, some food for thought about Purim.

No food is more identified with Purim than hamantaschen. Last year, I introduced you to hamantaschen for the adventurous, like cream cheese hamantaschen [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/hamacrch.htm] and beef-filled hamantaschen [http://dinnercoop.cs.cmu.edu/dinnercoop/Recipes/jody/FlayshigeHamantashen.html].

If you want to play it safe, you can find over a dozen more traditional recipes at the Jewish-food Hamantaschen archives [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/hamindex.htm]. By the way, if you're travelling in Israel, don't be surprised if you get some blank stares when you ask for hamantaschen when you really want "oznei haman" [http://israeliculture.tqn.com/library/weekly/aa030998.htm#haman].

One of the central mitzvot and joys of Purim is to send mishloach manot, a minimum of two items of food to one person (Esther 9:22) [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bible/mastr009.html]. Rabbi Yehudah Prero suggests that mishloach manot represents something much more than sending goodies but is actually a Gift of Unity [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/purim/5757/vol2no29.html]. Our happiness on Purim is to be expressed through festive feasts – which not everyone can afford. But because we do not want "to embarrass the poor, the rich give gifts to the poor, and the poor give gifts to the rich. All the members of the nation of Israel give indiscriminately to their brothers and sisters so all can celebrate Purim properly, without any shame."

Of course, many people go way beyond the minimum when sending out mishloach manot. There are many commercial sites that will prepare and deliver your goodies for you. But I like the Beit HaChatulim site, which not only has suggestions for what to put in your basket, but tips about deciding who gets what: "A" lists plates for special families, "B" lists plates for others [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/purim.htm]. You can find more tips and treats at Jewish Family [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/Article.asp?articleid=843].

Purim concludes with the festive meal, Seudat Purim [http://users.aol.com/rabbiyd/purim.html]. You may have your traditional menu, but if you want to try something a bit different this Purim, why not go back to the source: Persian food. How's this for a meal? Tangy tangerine chicken with some crusty spicy rice [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/Article.asp?articleid=843]; Purim ravioli (with spinach, chicken breast and pasta) [http://www.cyberkitchen.com/recipes/Purim_Raviolli.htm]; Ba'ba beh tamur (Iraqi pastries with almond or date filling) [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/recipes/Purim_Iraqi_Filled_Pastries.htm] topped off by homemade halvah [http://food.epicurious.com/run/recipe/view?id=40004].

If you are looking for yet more on Purim beyond food, I recommend Temple B'nai Shalom's Purim Pages [http://www.shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/va/va004/purim.html], Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx127.htm] and Jewish Communication Network [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/purim/index.htm].

Finally, I nearly choked on my hamantash when I came across "Latke vs. Hamantash: A Materialist-Feminist Analysis." [http://users.uniserve.com/~hostrov/latkes.html]. It is penned by the erudite Robin Leidner of University of Pennsylvania's Department of Sociology, who examines which food is more liberating for women, latkes or hamantaschen. Leidner rejects any suggestion that hamantaschen have "been part of the oppressive apparatus upholding the most retrograde patriarchal elements of Judaism" when she concludes that "for women, it is clear that hamantaschen offer far more scope for self-realization, egalitarian relations, and social progress than do latkes."

I'm glad Leidner removed the hamantash from her cheek long enough to firmly plant her tongue there.

Happy Purim and bon appétit!

Jewish Life

A journalist's life

"Arthur Koestler The Homeless Mind,"* by David Cesarani (Random House, $54.95).

A generation or so ago, the name and work of Arthur Koestler (1905-1983) were well known. He was regarded as an outstanding journalist and chronicler of his times. He wrote half a dozen novels, several volumes of autobiography, a series of original books on science, and dozens of elegantly phrased and stimulating essays on a variety of subjects.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Born in Budapest, he experienced a wealth of adventure in his early years. He was, in turn, an ardent member of a Zionist duelling fraternity in Vienna, a street vendor of lemonade in Haifa, an editor of a weekly in Cairo, a worker on a kibbutz in the Galilee, a member of the North Pole expedition of the Graf Zeppelin, a science writer and foreign correspondent for the liberal Ullstein publications in Berlin, and an active member of the German Communist party, which he had joined in 1931, two years before Hitler came to power, and for which he had become an important agent and propagandist.

Disillusioned with communism, he wrote a famous indictment of Stalin's Russia based on the Moscow trials. Darkness at Noon became one of the most influential, widely read, and widely translated political novels of the time. The morally concerned protagonist Rubashov, an old Bolshevik, finally confesses in prison, to crimes that he did not commit, as a last logical act of loyalty to the party.

Koestler reported the Spanish Civil War and was taken prisoner by Franco, narrowly escaping death. He returned to Palestine as a newspaperman in 1945 and again in 1948, and wrote a novel about Jewish settlement, Thieves in the Night (1946), and a historical study, Promise and Fulfilment: Palestine (1917-1949). The controversial epilogue of Promise and Fulfilment gives all Jews, after the establishment of the state, a "historic" choice between immigration to Israel or assimilation to the non-Jewish world.

His book The Thirteenth Tribe (1976), concerned the history and legacy of the Khazars, a tribe from the Caucasus that attained considerable regional power in the seventh to ninth centuries, and adopted Judaism before going into terminal decline in the 11th century, and fading out of history.

Koestler tries to prove that the majority of Jews stemmed from an obscure Caucasian tribe with no connection to the Patriarchs or to ancient Israel. The book was slaughtered by knowledgeable reviewers and not a single Jewish historian has given the slightest credence to Koestler's assertions.

In the second half of his life, he wrote a number of original but highly controversial books about science which include The Sleepwalkers (1959), The Act of Creation (1964) and The Ghost in the Machine (1967).

In 1983, he and his relatively youthful and healthy third wife committed suicide together when he could no longer cope with his terminal illness – Parkinson disease. This act, in which it appeared that he determined the fate of his wife, was widely denounced and lessened his reputation.

For the author, Koestler was a Jew "who was never given a chance to belong anywhere, a deracinated intellectual whose roots were treated with a kind of cultural weed killer. His Jewish identity was that of a member of a stereotyped minority, alternatively viewed with exaggerated respect or cosmic contempt.

"In the years during which he grew to maturity, as much to his ethnic as to his family background, his life was propelled and ruined by a never-ending quest for a satisfying identity and a home."

David Cesarani is a professor of modern Jewish history at Southampton University in England. His mammoth re-assessment of Koestler's life is the many-sided story of a fascinating, brilliant but conflicted personality against the background of a tumultuous century.

Rabbinic Reflections

Looking below the surface

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

We live today in a superficial world, a world where people are judged by externals. Whether it is the way we size up our spouses, leaders, employees, employers or even ourselves, society teaches us to look primarily at the external presentation.

As Jews, however, we know not to judge a book by its cover. The wise King Solomon, in his popular Aishet Chayil poem, describes the virtues of a woman of valor so eloquently: "Charm is deceptive and beauty is naught, a God-fearing woman is the one to be praised." We are taught by the Torah to look past the surface and find the "inner" qualities of a person.

Perhaps one of the reasons for today's high divorce rate is that contemporary relationships are based almost exclusively on external considerations. We look for external qualities and instant gratification instead of searching for inner qualities that endure the test of time.

At a Jewish wedding, just before the bride and groom march off to their chupah, there is an ancient custom observed, dating back to the biblical Isaac and Rebecca, called the bedecken. The groom, escorted by his parents and community leaders, goes to the bride in her chamber and places a veil over her face. One profound reason given for this custom, is to indicate that the groom is not primarily interested in her external physical beauty. Beauty is something that will fade in time, but if the groom is also attracted to the girl's inner spiritual quality, he is attracted to something he will never lose.

When Esther, the heroine of the Purim story, entered the royal chambers of King Achashverosh unannounced, to convince him to annul his decree against the Jews, she was clearly risking her life for the sake of her people. Nobody was allowed to enter the king's chambers without the king's explicit permission.

Yet, one would think that if she was trying to find favor in the eyes of the king, she would work out at an expensive royal health club, go for a royal makeover, visit Saks Fifth Avenue for an outfit and Bloomingdales for some jewelry, and only then see the king.

What does Esther do? Instead of relying on her physical beauty, she fasts and prays with all of her Jewish brethren for three consecutive days, asking HaShem to grant her success in her important mission. One could imagine the physical state she was in at the conclusion of a three-day fast and what she looked like. What was she thinking? Was she relying on a miracle? Doesn't Jewish tradition teach us not to rely on miracles or to place our life in danger?

Perhaps we can explain that Esther knew exactly what she was doing. She knew that the true charm of a Jewish woman is not her physical charm but her soul, her spirituality and inner beauty. Esther knew that after fasting and praying for three days, her true charm would shine through and reach the heart of King Achashverosh.

This is a wonderful lesson to all of us living in this Hollywood society that worships the body and all that's external. We have to start looking deeper than the surface and judge people for their inner qualities, spirituality and soul.

May this deeper approach be the catalyst for HaShem to judge our people for our inner qualities that have endured the ages, so that we merit the coming of Mashiach speedily in our days.

Happy Purim!

Rabbi Plotkin is the spiritual leader and executive director of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.

Agunah Get Days planned

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — March 4 and 18 have been declared Agunah Get Days, to facilitate the Jewish divorce process for reluctant or recalcitrant husbands – before Passover.

A news release from New York-based L'maan B'nos Yisrael International, under whose auspices Agunah Get Days are run, stated, "We cannot sit comfortably at our seder, saying kulanu benei chorin (we are all free), when so many of our Jewish daughters are denied their basic right of freedom to remarry because they are agunot."

Under Jewish law, a woman cannot remarry without a get. Should she remarry civilly without obtaining a get, children of the subsequent marriage are considered mamzerim (illegitimate) and may only marry another mamzer or a convert.

Marilyn Mattie Klein, a New Yorker who came up with the idea for agunah get days (two of which have already been held), started L'maan B'nos Yisrael last year to help agunot. She has been happily married for 25 years, and was moved to tears by the pleas of agunot who wanted her daughter to pray for them under the chupah. (According to Jewish tradition, a bride's prayers find their way directly to God.)

"People have to understand that if they have the blessings others don't, they are the ones in the position to help," she said in a phone interview.

The volunteer-run organization, which is supported by well over a dozen Orthodox organizations, sponsored two agunah get days last year. An anonymous donor is providing funding for the sofer (scribe).

"We will arrange the get nicely, respectfully, with dignity," said Klein. "We appreciate the fact [the husbands] are now doing the right thing, and they're treated accordingly, in a positive manner. We want people to feel comfortable coming to us."

At Klein's request, Rabbi Mordechai Tendler wrote a prayer for agunot. There are versions appropriate for reciting under the chupah, at candlelighting time, and together with psalms or other prayers.

"We need God's help," said Klein, whose Canadian contacts thus far include Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir Beth Din and Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Congregation.

L'Maan B'nos Yisrael is also contacting rebbitzens to ask that they organize agunah help centres in their synagogues.

The organization has a policy of not releasing statistics, rather focusing on the importance of each individual case. "We're getting many [gittin], thank God," said Klein, who noted that one success resulted from a husband seeing an article in The CJN.

For the past several years, vigils have been held in several Canadian cities on the eve of the Fast of Esther to increase awareness of the plight of agunot. This year, Montreal Women's Federation is holding a study session on Purim morning, March 2, to be led by Norma Joseph.

National Council of Jewish Women has invited all Jewish organizations to participate in a dawn-to-dusk fast for agunot on International Women's Day, March 8.

L'maan B'nos Yisrael can be contacted at 718-338-0833.

Jewish nursing home residents get mezuzot

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lincoln Place nursing home's Jewish residents now have mezuzot on their doors, thanks to donations by their families and by the home's administration.

It is part of Lincoln Place's attempt to "make the environment more Jewishly hospitable," explained programs' manager Nancy Ferareza. The mezuzot were put up last week in every room where at least one of the residents is Jewish, and on the front door and various other places around the home.

While Lincoln Place always had a sizable proportion of Jewish residents, that number has been increasing in the last four or five years, said Ferareza. Three-quarters of the home's 260 residents are now Jewish, she said.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services for Jewish Family & Child Service, said that his office was contacted by the administration to suggest ways to enhance the lives of the Jewish residents. The food is kosher, religious services, led by volunteers, are held on Shabbat and yom tov, and now, Rabbi Mark Breslow is on site during the week.

While putting up mezuzot may seem like a small thing, Rabbi Weiss said, in fact it is very significant. "It says to a person coming along that this is a Jewish home," he said. "It is as much cultural as religious."

The mezuzot are only a small part of Jewish programming at Lincoln Place. Penny Edwards, Jewish programming coordinator, said that there is a symbolic Shabbat program every Friday afternoon, which includes candlelighting, kiddush and challah.

Once a week, a Jewish Hour may include a discussion about holidays, a Yiddish video, Israeli folk dancing, or Jewish trivia. Staff members bring in artifacts to make a mini-museum, said second-floor recreation therapist Rebecca Sheen, such as a havdalah candle or a spice box. "Everyone sits around and reminisces about how things used to be," she said.

Rabbi Breslow gives a Torah class once a week, as well. Holidays are celebrated with great enthusiasm,he said. On Chanukah, a menorah is lit in the smoking room, and electric ones are lit on each floor. A masquerade ball and a festive meal highlight Purim, said Sheen.

Ferareza noted that the religious needs of the non-Jewish residents are also served. There is a Roman Catholic mass once a week, for instance, and a Christian chaplain is in place.

Rabbi Weiss said the 167 mezuzot represent "a momentous commitment on the part of the home, not just financially, but the idea of putting them up where they hadn't ever been before."

Jewish, Rwandan survivors explore healing process

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The scars inflicted by unspeakable tragedies have brought together two different communities trying to explore healing.

In the second of a series of dialogues, Jewish Holocaust survivors commiserated last week with survivors of Rwanda's 1994 genocide. The two sides, with little in common save for the horror they experienced, shared their sorrow, but also explored how to take important initial steps toward opening up and dealing with pain.

The session, held at the Lipa Green building, drew about a dozen mainly young Rwandans, about half of whom survived the 1994 bloodbath in which over a million moderate Hutus and Tutsis were butchered by Hutu extremists in just over three months.

Comparisons of the genocide to the Holocaust are frequent. Judging by their reticence to open up and share their pain, the Rwandans seem to be where Holocaust survivors were in the first few years after World War II, when either they remained silent or no one was willing to listen.

Facilitator Alan Bardikoff, a psychologist who specializes in trauma and coping, said he believes that often, talking to other survivors of terrible events can be therapeutic. "People don't heal in isolation," he said. "Sometimes, we just need people."

Begun last autumn, the joint sessions were intended to foster dialogue, understanding and support between the two communities, said Carole Ann Reed, education director at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre. Central issues include whether it's better to speak about the past or avoid painful memories.

Common ground found

The two sides are still feeling their way, but common ground was shown in questions posed by the Rwandans – questions that are often asked by Jewish non-survivors.

One wondered how Holocaust survivors coped and even went on to become productive, relatively well-adjusted people.

"It helped to be numb for a while," responded survivor Judy Cohen. "It helped to do what everyone else was doing: working, raising children, just living. Eventually, the pain subsides. It wasn't all darkness."

She encouraged the Rwandan survivors "to go on talking about it, but to go on living too."

Anita Ekstein, a child survivor of the Holocaust, said she "forced" herself not to think about her ordeal and never talked about it outside her immediate family until 1991, when a conference for child survivors was held.

The Rwandans, it seemed, aren't nearly at the point yet where they will soon hold conferences. Because their wounds are still fresh, they're still groping to find the language to describe the horrors that engulfed their country.

One Rwandan participant wondered aloud whether remembering the genocide and holding memorials for the dead would impede the healing process.

Evariste Sibomana, a Rwandan survivor, said he "promised never to cry for anything other than what I should have cried for." He spent six months in prison for "sympathizing with the enemy," an experienced he described as "too graphic to explain."

He complained of the ignorance about the events in his country. Often, he said, people don't even know where Rwanda is. "People are supposed to know what's going on, but they don't."

Leo Kabalisa, an activist in Toronto's 300-member Rwandan community, said there are pointed cultural and gender differences among his people: "Men cry, but in private. In public, they want to show they are strong."

One Holocaust survivor said she only began to heal when she started to volunteer at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

A young Rwandan woman remarked that while in exile in neighboring Burundi, "nothing was said. Discussion was taboo."

Bardikoff observed that the Holocaust and the Rwandan genocide "share many similarities, and just as many differences."

The two groups have pledged to keep talking.

Leo Baeck celebrates 25th anniversary

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leo Baeck Day School, which has grown from 100 students to 725, is celebrating its 25th anniversary.

A gala dinner reception with a silent auction and entertainment, to be held March 25 at Le Parc, is a highlight of the anniversary celebrations, which also include other events.

The alumni of the only Reform Jewish day school in Canada are invited to attend a memorabilia reunion on May 30 at the school's main campus, at 36 Atkinson Ave., in Thornhill . The other campus is located at Holy Blossom Temple.

The inaugural presentation of the school's new award for excellence in Jewish education will take place at the gala. The award's first recipient will be Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, who was a pupil of Dr. Leo Baeck in Berlin.

Rabbi Plaut, the rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple, was one of the early advocates of a Reform day school named in Baeck's honor. The award will be presented by Prof. Michael Brown, director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

According to education director Zita Gardner and current school president Mark Shiner, there is no mystery as to why the school, one of the oldest and largest in the Reform movement, has doubled its enrolment in the past seven years.

"Our parents are committed to Judaism and a lot of them are worried about what's happening in the public schools," Gardner said. "They like the attention given to their children in a vigorous program and they think our school is the place to be."

The school's combined staff of 70, is made up of 60 teachers. One-third of the day is spent on Hebrew arts, including the study of Torah and Israel; one-third on English language arts; and in grades 1 to 5, one-third on math, science and social studies, Gardner noted.

She said the spirit of the anniversary year was evident as early as last September, when the students and staff all showed up on the first day of classes wearing anniversary-T shirts

To mark this milestone, UJA Federation teamed up with the school in December to send 19 staffers on a two-week tour of Israel, led by Rabbi Dow Marmur.

Gardner spoke of another anniversary event, a recent Shabbat service and dinner at Temple Emanu-El, attended by 800 people. She said Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld recalled that Leo Baeck's first classes were held on the premises while Rabbi Plaut spoke about Baeck's vision for Reform day schools.

During the past seven years, one-third of the school's graduates have gone on to attend the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Gardner said.

The school goes from kindergarten to Grade 8 at the main campus and up to Grade 5 at Holy Blossom.

However, that campus will include Grade 6 next year, because there is a "resurgence" of young couples moving into that area, Gardner said.

A compact disc of the school's student choir will be released during the year, she added.

Andrea Rifkin and Loren Kruger are co-chairs of the 25th anniversary events while Tom Unger is chair of the gala. For more information about the gala, call (905) 477-9022, extension 228.

Volunteers lend comforting hand at hospice program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Karen Fenwick

Alan Simons

TORONTO — Karen Fenwick is used to being asked, "How can you do it?"

The question refers to her volunteer work with the Jewish Hospice Program. The 42-year-old, married mother of four spends about two hours a week with a terminally ill patient, providing companionship and practical assistance.

"It's one of the most rewarding things I've ever done," she says.

Despite a busy schedule including other community commitments, Fenwick has found enormous fulfilment in volunteering with the hospice program.

She practises dentistry in her spare time, she jokes, referring to her two-day-a-week work schedule.

Since the hospice program began in 1993, lay volunteers like Fenwick have made up part of a team that includes a social worker from Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS); Rabbi Ronald Weiss, Toronto's JF&CS-based director of chaplaincy; and physicians specializing in palliative care and pain control.

The program itself is a joint initiative of five organizations: JF&CS, UJA Federation, Mount Sinai Hospital, Circle of Care and Baycrest. They serve clients of all ages.

Client families appreciate the support, says Sheila Walker of JF&CS, who coordinates the program. Often there is a "tremendous sense of relief" on the part of the caregiver when the volunteer arrives and they can run errands or just have a break.

Walker sees the volunteers, who have each undergone careful screening and eight intensive training sessions, as "somewhere between a guardian angel and a professional. They're devoted, compassionate and very intelligent."

Qualities sought in volunteers include emotional maturity and an ability to listen without feeling the need to offer solutions, says the program's coordinator of volunteers, Susan Samila of Circle of Care. She also runs a bereavement support program.

Fenwick joined the program almost three years ago after seeing a CJN ad. Her youngest child had entered full-day school, and she was looking for something meaningful to do with her time.

Different clients have different needs, she has found. One client needed social support because her friends had "jumped ship," Fenwick recalls. "We were her friends until she died."

'There's someone else who needs you'

Another wanted certain types of meals, and Fenwick cooked for her.

For her, the client's death is the hardest part, particularly if they have gotten to know each other well. "You mourn," she says. "[But] you heal, and there's someone else who needs you, so you move on."

Alan Simons, a native of London, England who immigrated here 32 years ago, commends the program coordinators and team members for the support they give volunteers.

Like Fenwick, Simons makes time for the hospice despite other commitments. "They don't seem to happen at the same time," he says.

The chief financial officer of an investment banking company, Simons, 58, was recently named Ontario's honorary consul general for the Republic of Rwanda.

Volunteering with terminally ill people gives him much satisfaction. He says it even brings joy, attributable to the client-volunteer connection and the knowledge that he's helping someone.

Touch and humor are part of volunteers' tools at hospice

hospice program came several years ago. As a divorced father of three children (who were then in their 20s and late teens), he entered into a relationship with a woman who had had a bout with breast cancer.

When it metastasized and he contacted the hospice program, a team swung into action on short notice, earning Simons' immediate respect.

He married Pam four days before her death and agreed to become a volunteer after a chance meeting with Walker.

Now, six clients later, he speaks to new recruits as part of the volunteer training program.

He tells them of the intrinsic value of life and the importance of hope – for freedom from pain, an extension of life and "a good death."

Touch and humor are also important, he believes. Sometimes he just sits and holds a client's hand.

"In our religion, traditionally, one should not die alone," he says. "We joke, we smile. Humor is so important."

'Learn about life'

Simons says his volunteer work has brought a new spiritual aspect to his life. It has also made him think about his own mortality. "Certainly I would like to die at home when my time comes, with lots of people around me who are happy and joking and talking to me and treating me like I'm alive."

Working with terminally ill people, "you learn a lot about life and a lot about individuals."

The work isn't for everyone, he admits, but he insists volunteers get back more than they give.

Fenwick couldn't agree more. "It has changed me profoundly," she says. "I'm not the same person I was when I started. You have to look into yourself. You have to deal with...what's important in life.

"You really have to soul-search. It makes you leave superficiality behind, see beyond the surface. It leads you into many areas of spirituality."

On a more mundane level, Fenwick has begun to see the importance of taking better care of herself and now works out regularly.

"I have a very complete life," she says, "and that fulfils me."

(For further information, prospective clients should call Sheila Walker at 416-638-7800; prospective volunteers, Susan Samila at 416-635-2860.)

Racist Web site removed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Calgary-based Internet Service Provider (ISP) has removed a racist Web site that promoted Aryan nationalism and called for racial segregation.

CadVision, a major provider of access to the Internet in the Calgary area, removed the Web site of The Society for the Segregation of the Races (SSR) after CadVision was contacted by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC). Letters from the SWC pointed out that SSR's credo reflected "an expression of the Nazi ideology, a set of beliefs that led to the wanton murder of millions of Gypsies, Poles, Jews and Ukrainians during World War II."

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, described the site as "pure Hitler racism."

A preliminary conversation with CadVision's manager led to a defensive reaction in which the executive defended freedom of expression and in which he argued that CadVision was not concerned with the site's contents, Littman said.

Shortly afterwards, "without informing us, CadVision pulled the plug on this guy," he said. "He then took his business to the United States."

Littman said a 21-year-old Calgary student was responsible for the site's contents. The Web site featured Nazi colors, swastikas and other racist elements. The site also provided links to various white supremacist groups in Canada and the United States, including the Heritage Front, Freedom Site, Stormfront and Knights of Freedom.

Calls to CadVision were not returned by press time.

Teachers head back to court over paid religious leave

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish teachers in Winnipeg's public school system, who are fighting for paid religious leave on the High Holy Days, have won a legal round.

Last March, a Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench judge threw the Charter of Rights challenge of 66 Jewish teachers in Winnipeg's public school system out of court, arguing that paid religious leave was a matter for arbitration or for the collective bargaining process.

The teachers, through the Manitoba Teacher's Society, appealed. On Feb. 10, the Manitoba Court of Appeal sent the case back to the Court of Queen's Bench.

The four school divisions named in the court challenge are Winnipeg School Division No.1, Assiniboine South, Seven Oaks and Fort Garry.

The teachers want to be able to take off Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur with pay when they fall on weekdays. Currently, Winnipeg 1 allows employees two days off for religious leave, and Fort Garry and Assiniboine South allow one religious day off with pay a year. Seven Oaks requires teachers taking religious leave to share the cost of a substitute.

Thus far, the four-year fight has cost the teachers $150,000 in legal fees. Mel Myers, the teachers' lawyer, hopes that the case can be heard in Court of Queen's Bench before the end of the current school year on June 30.

Sharon Home expanding

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Sharon Home Jewish seniors' residence, is moving forward with plans to open a satellite location in south Winnipeg.

The north Winnipeg Jewish institution has purchased 6.23 acres of land for about $775,000. Construction of the new building is scheduled to begin some time in July, says Audrey Arlinsky, Sharon Home's president and CEO.

The Kanee Centre of the Sharon Home in north Winnipeg currently has 229 residents. The board is looking to have a south Winnipeg presence because a majority of the Jewish population now lives south. The plans call for a seniors' campus incorporating an independent living complex and personal care home, and community outreach services to assist seniors to stay in their homes as long as possible.

"The average age of our residents is 87," Arlinsky says. "The level of care required is getting higher. We are not admitting many lighter care cases. The goal is to keep them in their homes as long as they can manage with help."

The first phase of the $13 million project (which also includes renovations to the existing four-storey structure) will consist of a two-storey personal care home with 72 private rooms divided into four clusters of nine rooms on each floor. Each cluster will have a small lounge at the end of the corridor, while each grouping of 18 rooms will have a dining/activity room, a lounge overlooking a central courtyard, a spa room for bathing and a resident care centre.

The design for the Sharon Home South, which will be ready for display as of March 1, will feature a central fireside lounge, multi-purpose room/synagogue, hair salon, adult day program area and a family room. A garden will surround the outside.

Canadian Jew connects with Cuban community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Sydney Fisher

TORONTO — Sydney Fisher remembers his first trip to Cuba very well.

It was January 1989 and like thousands of Canadians he was planning a winter vacation under the tropical sun.

As a favor to others, he agreed to take a dozen prayer books from his synagogue, the Adath Israel, and pass them along to a shul in Havana.

Finding the Havana synagogue was an adventure in itself. Speaking no Spanish and unfamiliar with the city, Fisher was stymied by its tucked-away location in the old, rundown part of town. Even cab drivers hadn't heard of it.

Eventually he found the shul and completed his mission.

For Fisher, that first trip was an eye-opener. The Cuban Jewish population of 1,200 (1,000 of them living in Havana), he learned, were conscious of their heritage but they lived in dire poverty.

"They had nothing," he recalled. "The conditions I saw the first time were unbelievable. And yet, they carried on with twice-daily minyans."

Touched by the plight of the Jews he met, Fisher dipped into his own pocket and purchased dozens of loaves of bread, 100 lbs. of butter, pasta, milk and other staples at a store that accepted only foreign currency.

Word of his presence spread within the community. Young Cuban Jews sought him out and peppered him with questions about the Jewish people, the Jewish community in Canada and Israel.

Living in Cuba, where overt religious observance was considered unpatriotic, they had little knowledge of the rest of ther Jewish world, Fisher said. The synagogue was populated mostly by the seniors who had immigrated to Cuba decades before, while the young people were far from pious.

By the time he left, four of the young Jews he met decided to form a casual study group to discuss various aspects of Jewish life and Jewish history.

Fisher returned that May with Spanish-language educational materials and helped get the study group on its feet.

Since those first trips, Fisher has visited Cuba twice a year like clockwork, in January and May. Over the years, he's become one of the community's main benefactors, purchasing for Havanah's Adath Israel Synagogue big ticket items like an oven, a freezer, a television, a VCR, dishes and an air conditioning unit.

On each visit he loads up his suitcase with other necessities, like underwear, shirts and socks, which he gives to the Adath Israel to be distributed to the impoverished elderly worshippers.

A pharmacist by occupation, Fisher fills his suitcases with drugs as well, having brought, he estimates, about 500 lbs. in the last three years.

The pharmaceuticals, including antibiotics, asthma sprays and heart drugs, have been donated by Leslie Dan of Novopharm and Barry Sherman of Apotex.

Fisher's nephew, Ian Fisher, who distributes reading glasses across Southern Ontario, provides six dozen pairs of glasses each time his uncle visits Cuba.

For the impoverished Cuban Jews, the gifts make a huge difference. The level of poverty in Cuba is staggering, Fisher said, worse than 10 years ago.

that. One can of tuna cost $2.50 in hard currency.

Meat is rationed, with 12 oz. allotted per person per month – if you have hard currency. Milk is restricted to children under seven. Most people subsist on a diet of rice and black beans, supplemented with bananas, cabbage and tomatoes.

With the recent liberalization of Cuban life, kosher meat has become available. Shchitah is permitted (although the shochet is not, halachically speaking, Jewish) and the meat is distributed on three Tuesdays a month at the Adath Israel. That meat can be purchased for pesos, he said.

Fisher is not the only one helping the Cuban community. Panamanian Jews provide assistance while his synagogue donates $250 to the Adath Israel in Havana.

For years, Canadian Jewish Congress has sent $35,000 of Passover products to the community.

The Joint Distribution Committee (the Joint) also assists Cuban Jews. It subsidizes the visits of Rabbi Shmuel Steinhandler from Mexico.

He spends three weeks in Havana three or four times a year instructing in the Jewish religion. Two young Argentine teachers, also under auspices of the Joint, visit Cuba three or four times a year as well.

For Fisher, helping his fellow Jews in Cuba is axiomatic. "There are people there with the same names as the people in Toronto.

"It could have been us living in Cuba. We can't be so smug because we live in one of the best communities in the world," he said.

Since his initial visit, Fisher has learned Spanish so he can converse more easily with the locals. He's also become knowledgeable in Cuban Jewish history.

Jews began arriving in Cuba in large numbers after the turn of the century. The first wave were Americans who had participated in the Spanish-American War. They were followed by Turkish Jews who immigrated during and after World War I.

The largest wave of immigrants came from Eastern Europe in the 1920s and '30s. By the 1950s the community had reached 15,000 in number and was prospering. Many Jews had become merchants and some owned small factories.

The '50s saw a building boom. The Adath Israel, with 550 seats, was constructed as a three-storey structure that included a 100-seat chapel and a social hall.

This boy and his mother came to Havana from the town of Camaguay to celebrate his bar mitzvah. Camaguay has 60 Jewish people.

The Beth Sholom, built in the middle class Vedada area, had 1,000 seats, a community centre, a day school, a kosher restaurant and a small theatre. The Centro Sepharad was also erected in Vedada.

The Communist revolution changed Jewish life. Within a few years of Castro's ascension to power, 14,000 of the island's Jews left for the United States or Latin America, including all the community's rabbis. About 1,000 remained in Havana and a small community of 200 lived in Santiago de Cuba.

The level of Jewish identification dropped under the Communists, who frowned on religious observance but did not persecute Jews. Intermarriage was common and few of today's young Jews can point to two Jewish parents, Fisher said.

Nevertheless, identification with the Jewish past remained. Over the years, the Jewish study group grew to 163 members. In the last seven years, 275 Jews, mostly in their 20s and 30s, made aliyah to Israel.

Even Castro has taken notice of the community. Last December, the Cuban leader visited the Adath Israel and spent three hours at a Chanukah party.

Nevertheless, the plight of the community's older members remains dire. Seniors subsist on pensions of $3 to $4 a month.

Adath Israel still gets two minyans a day, and 60 people (mostly seniors) might attend services, but in part it's because participants receive a breakfast of a small roll, butter and coffee, Fisher said.

Benmergui slams intolerance of Israel's haredi extremists

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO—

Calling the Diaspora "dumbly silent," Ralph Benmergui urged Canadian Jews to be more critical of Israel.

The host of two CBC Newsworld shows, Benmergui Live and Not Just the News, recently spoke at Ryerson Polytechnic University, as part of a speakers series presented by Jewish Campus Services.

Benmergui said one of his biggest worries is the intolerance of Israel's haredi extremists. "I don't like their vision ... it's not tolerant. It's not even tolerant of other Jews, let alone Arabs."

Having travelled to Israel eight years ago with his mother, Benmergui recalled sitting in an old synagogue in Jerusalem and being stared at by a young Orthodox man, standing directly in front of him.

Benmergui felt that the man was trying to intimidate him in an effort to make him leave the synagogue because he wasn't Orthodox, he said. "The racism of Jew against Jew in Israel is astounding."

Jews in the Diaspora have every right to discuss and criticize Israeli affairs, but often the mentality among Israeli Jews is: "You don't live here, so shut up," Benmergui said.

He criticized Israel's political system, saying there are "small factions or parties which hold enormous sway over governments."

He also denounced the violence in that country. "You can't keep killing people and have it all be called moral relativism. You know [the argument] it's okay to blow that guy's head off on the cell phone because he's a bastard."

In an interview after the talk, Benmergui said he deplores the use of violence as a way of resolving disputes in the Middle East.

"You end up in a blood feud. You end up with an eye for an eye [mentality] until the whole world becomes blind. You can't just keep killing for killing."

Benmergui, a Sephardi Jew (he's from Morocco), also spoke about working in "the waspish culture at the CBC."

He said, "Being the Jew is like being the odd one out." He joked that the annual Chanukah party at the CBC usually consists of "all the Jews scampering up to the 10th floor for some latkes."

Benmergui, whose two shows air at 11 a.m. and noon, said he is not a workaholic and his main priority is his children.

"If you really want to get noticed [in television] you go on in the morning or evening," he said.

But Benmergui said he made the decision to have afternoon shows because he wanted to spend more time with his children.

And he said he certainly doesn't regret that decision, noting that he gets "an inordinate amount of joy" out of making sandwiches for his children.

Jewish Campus Services plans student arts festival

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) is sponsoring its second annual student arts festival.

Coloring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Student Creativity will feature a variety of creative art forms during a three-day festival at the Poor Alex Theatre, on the southwest corner of Brunswick Avenue and Bloor Street, from March 7 to 9.

This year's theme is What's on your mind? All participants are Jewish students, although the content of the work is not necessarily Jewish per se.

The festival will kick off on Sunday afternoon with opening ceremonies at 5:30. The visual arts gallery, featuring some 30 works, will be open from 4 p.m.

Other forms of creative expression will be presented at 7:30 each night: March 7, a screening of short films, lasting about 70 minutes; Mar. 8, a musical presentation; and Mar. 9, theatre, dance, storytelling, poetry and prose.

"To see so many Jews from so many different backgrounds and streams coming together and working in harmony and with a sense of purpose has been very exciting for me," said Yoni Stanleigh, a fourth-year University of Toronto student and one of 24 volunteers working on the project.

Tickets are $7, $5 for students for one-time admission. Advance tickets for extra nights are $3.

For further information, contact Tamar Kagan, festival director and JCS arts and culture coordinator, at 878-9658. For tickets, call Jewish Campus Services at 785-1465.

Israel steers clear of Kurdish question: analyst

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The standing order of every Israeli defence minister since the country forged strategic and security ties with Turkey has been to stay out of the Turkish-Greek conflict and to be especially careful to steer clear of Turkey's internal dispute with the Kurdish community.

Ankara accepted the Israeli position on the Greek issue, but the Turks occasionally made efforts to obtain advice from Israel on fighting terrorism and protecting borders by sophisticated means. In responding to such requests, Israel was extremely careful to ensure that its advice did not go beyond purely professional aspects or have any bearing on the Kurds' struggle for autonomy.

Washington recommended that Israel assist the Turks with professional advice on how best to seal their border with Iraq, which squads of the PKK (Kurdistan Workers party) routinely crossed in order to launch attacks in which thousands of civilians died. On one occasion, IDF officers went to Turkey to survey ways to seal the border, but this was an isolated case.

Nevertheless, in the Kurdish organization, only the PKK under Abdullah Ocalan hurled baseless accusations at Israel. At one point, the PKK maintained two training bases in the Lebanese Beka'a, which is under Syrian control. It currently has bases in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. The PKK also has ongoing ties with a number of Damascus-based Palestinian "rejectionist" groups. It is the only Kurdish organization on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist organizations.

PKK accusations against Israel, and more specifically against the Mossad intelligence agency, predate Ocalan's kidnapping in Kenya. After being detained by the Italians in Rome and before moving on to Kenya, Ocalan, in an interview with Jane's Intelligence Review, said he believed the Mossad was tracking him in the service of Turkish intelligence. After he was seized in Kenya, allegations of Israeli involvement escalated, finally bringing about the Berlin attack.

Ocalan, however, failed to mention that Syria had expelled him in the wake of Turkish pressure, after he had found refuge in Damascus for years. He said he left Syria after he reached the conclusion that a war between Turkey and Syria was liable to erupt because of him.

As for the incident in Berlin, a preliminary investigation shows that once the Kurdish demonstrators burst into the facility, some brandishing axes, the security guards had no choice but to open fire on them. In the meantime, extra guards are being sent to a number of countries in order to beef up security at Israeli legations.

Kurdish rebel leader Abdullah Ocalan had been tracked by western intelligence since he left Syria last fall, including during a previously undisclosed stay in Iran.

Apparently his capture in Italy last November set in motion a series of events that eventually led to his arrest in Nairobi and his imprisonment in Turkey. The apprehension of Ocalan touched off a wave of violent protests throughout Europe this month.

Italian intelligence received preliminary warning of Ocalan's arrival at Rome's international airport last November. The Italians were notified that Ocalan was on his way to Italy, and was not in Russia as claimed by sources in the PKK, the Kurdish rebel group.

After leaving Syria last fall Ocalan went to Iran through the intervention of Syrian intelligence. From Tehran, the Italians were told, Ocalan wanted to get to Italy and then disappear into the large Kurdish community in Europe.

The advice given to the Italians was that it would be best to arrest Ocalan on his arrival, and not to let him get away. That is exactly what happened at Rome Airport in November.

From this course of events it is now clear that Ocalan's itinerary was known to those following him from when he left Syria – and possibly earlier.

One can surmise that Ocalan's entourage was riddled with leaks. From the moment he was arrested in Rome it was clear that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for him to evade surveillance.

Ocalan is now awaiting trial in Turkey. The leadership vacuum at the top of the PKK is being filled by two men: Morat Karailan as head of the military wing and Kamil Baik as head of the political wing.

Even after the shooting at the Israeli consulate in Berlin last Wednesday, where three Kurdish demonstrators were killed by Israeli security officers, the Mossad does not regard the PKK as an enemy. In addition, contrary to previous reports, the Mossad did not send a warning to the Kurdish independence organization.

Turkish intelligence, on the other hand, does regard Ocalan as a serious threat. U.S. intelligence services regard the PKK as a terrorist threat, as do the Germans, though not to the extent that the Americans do.

Even before Ocalan left Syria, where he had been sheltered for several years with many of his closest aides, the PKK issued false information about his whereabouts. One rumor said Ocalan went from Syria to Iraq after winning Saddam Hussein's patronage. But it quickly became clear that the rumor was misinformation, aimed at hiding Ocalan's true plans to leave Syria when it became clear the Turks might attack Syria if they didn't give him up to Istanbul.

Ocalan expected the Russians to provide him a haven, as they did in the past for Kurdish leader Mustafa Barazani. But his hopes were dashed when Russian Prime Minister Yvgeny Primakov turned him down. Syria then negotiated with Tehran on Ocalan's behalf, and Ocalan went to Iran, until he decided to go to western Europe, where he felt he could find shelter among his supporters.

When arrested in Rome, Ocalan told the representative of Italian intelligence that he wanted Italy to serve as an intermediary in negotiations with Turkey to put an end to the 12-year-old war between Turkey and the Kurdish guerrillas. He asked that Washington and the European Union also be approached in his name with the request they pressure Ankara to negotiate with him.

But his requests for negotiations fell on deaf ears in Turkey, where Ankara was angered by Italian refusals to turn Ocalan over. At the same time, the Italians asked the Germans if they would be prepared to give Ocalan haven,but Germany said no. From that point, it became clear Ocalan could not stay long in Italy.

But the villa prepared for him outside Rome was already under the surveillance of more than one intelligence service, and Ocalan had no chance to evade them.

The Greeks, considered Turkey's opponents, offered him a way out of Rome, through Nairobi. But it became apparent that the Greeks and Kenyans have other priorities more important than granting Ocalan sanctuary, thereby offending the United States.

The charges that the Mossad was involved in the capture are part of a disinformation campaign meant to draw attention away from those responsible for Ocalan's capture. He never was defined as a threat, despite his connections to the Palestinian rejectionists and Syrian intelligence.

Conference explores meaning of modern Orthodoxy

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A sense of community. That was the overriding feeling among some 1,500 modern Orthodox Jews who gathered here for a conference over the Presidents Day weekend.

Organized by the nascent group Edah, the goal of the conference was to rearticulate just what it means to be a modern Orthodox Jew today.

This event, which drew twice as many people as expected, came at a time when many adherents of modern Orthodoxy are struggling to define their movement's philosophy.

"I'm joyous," said Beth Wohlgelernter, a New Yorker who manages a start-up high technology firm and was a member of the Edah-conference-planning committee.

"I feel like we were all wandering in the desert for 40 years, but now I have a community again," she said, while surveying the crowded hotel ballroom as she waited for the group's spiritual mentor, Rabbi Saul Berman, to begin his keynote address.

The conference, titled Orthodoxy Encounters a Changing World, attracted participants from as far away as California, North Carolina and Canada.

Other hallmarks of the conference were the prominence of women as plenary lecturers and teachers, the gathering's central focus on "women's issues," and nearly equal time was devoted to exploring Jewish texts and Orthodox legal and communal policy issues.

"There's no better place than this conference to find people who are inspiring us to engage the world while we stick to our modern Orthodox traditions," said Rabbi Gershon Sonnenschein, who came from Springfield, Mass., with 14 people from Congregation Kadimah, the synagogue he leads.

"Just being together with this many people is very empowering," he said.

The conference was also an opportunity for participants, particularly those in many of the dozens of sessions, to engage in a critique of modern Orthodoxy's failings.

"To be a modern Orthodox Jew today is often to feel lonely, to be without a community in which to ask ideological questions," said Rabbi Daniel Lehmann, who was ordained at Yeshiva University and is now headmaster of the pluralistic New Jewish High School, in Waltham, Mass.

Even with the strong feelings of community, the participants' views were not monolithic.

Respectful disagreement on such issues as the right balance between modernity and traditional Jewish priorities, and on the appropriate ritual roles for women, was heard in many workshop sessions.

The diversity of dress provided an obvious illustration of the ideological span found at the conference.

Some women covered every strand of their hair with wigs and scarves, while most left their heads uncovered. Some wore long sleeves and long skirts, others wore shorter skirts, and other women wore slacks.

Most of the men wore colorful shirts and knitted kipot, though some were dressed in the more somber attire of dark suits, white shirts and black kipot common in the fervently Orthodox community.

A multiplicity of visions for the movement was also evident as participants bandied about alternatives to the term "modern Orthodoxy."

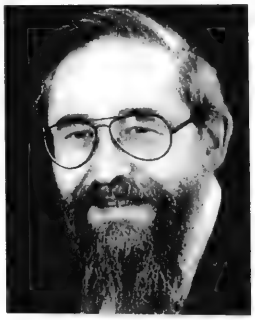
In his presentation on Assessments of, and Visions for, Modern Orthodoxy, Rabbi Lehmann disavowed the term "centrist Orthodoxy," a label that has gained currency in recent years, among Orthodox Jews who feel that the modifier "modern" is, well, too modern.

Rabbi Lehmann offered as alternatives the terms "open Orthodoxy," "progressive Orthodoxy" and "post-modern Orthodoxy." He also jokingly suggested "bourgeois Orthodoxy."

Attending this session, Eli Leitner of New York City, suggested the term "heterodox Orthodoxy."

"The fact that we're not comfortable with the names points to the need for ideological clarification" in the movement, said Rabbi Lehmann.

Many committed to a modern Orthodox integration of religious and secular life have in recent years felt delegitimized by the Haredim, or fervently Orthodox, who view the religious and secular worlds as essentially incompatible.



Rabbi Saul Berman

A longtime hallmark of modern Orthodoxy – a willingness to have dialogue and work with non-Orthodox Jews – has been eroded in recent years, as the movement's institutions, like the Orthodox Union and Rabbinical Council of America, and a growing number of their constituents, have withdrawn from such endeavors on national and local levels.

It has left those who remain committed to such cooperation feeling isolated.

Rabbi Sonnenschein sits down monthly with one Reform and two Conservative rabbis in Springfield for a regular dialogue. He said he is the only one of three Orthodox rabbis in town willing to do so.

Out of those meetings, he said, has emerged a plan to jointly promote Shabbat Across America (it takes place March 12), a program under the auspices of the National Jewish Outreach Project, and to conclude it with a joint Havdalah service at the local Jewish Community Center.

The feeling of delegitimization is played out not only on the institutional and leadership level, said some of those attending the conference, but also in a personal way.

York University student Dassi Rutman, one of about 200 university students who attended the conference, said she was hoping that she would "feel more secure with my identity" as a modern Orthodox Jew.

"I'm modern Orthodox, but I feel the pressures from people around me, friends who are moving to the right," said Rutman. She is one of the only people in her community who wears pants, she said. "It's hard keeping your ideals when people around you feel it's wrong."

In his keynote address, Rabbi Berman, Edah's director, said modern Orthodoxy is a religious path defined by "maximum integration with society" whose adherents "simultaneously affirm a passionate total commitment to Halachah.

"We have chosen the more difficult path" than those on the right-wing side of Orthodoxy, who choose "maximum withdrawal and maximum isolation" from general society.

But it is in the dialectic between two seemingly antagonistic value systems that modern Orthodoxy can make a contribution to both personal and communal life, he said.

"There are moments of conflict

• Israeli jets struck a suspected Hezbollah base in the second straight day of attacks in south Lebanon. The air strike followed an attack by Hezbollah against an IDF outpost. (Later in the week the human rights group B'tselem announced it would expand its coverage into south Lebanon.)

Feb. 16

• Israeli, Jordanian, Egyptian and Palestinian officials met in Amman to discuss a common front against drug smuggling.

• Yad Vashem provided Switzerland with a list of more than one million Jews killed during the Holocaust. The move is designed to help Swiss banks identify and repay World War II-era dormant accounts.

Feb. 17

• A dispute erupted with the Palestinian Authority (PA) over control of the Al-Aksa Mosque in Jerusalem. The Jerusalem mufti appointed by the PA in 1994 wants to open a new office at the mosque, which Israel says would violate the peace accords.

• Israel announced it is seeking ways to improve trade with Jordan.

Feb. 18

• Israel police are investigating Ariel Sharon on charges of bribery arising from allegations that he bribed a former general, Avigdor Ben-Gal, to give false testimony in a 1997 libel trial that he lost against Ha'aretz.

• In response to the massive protests last week in Jerusalem, there was a sharp increase in the number of Israelis registering with the Reform movement, according to the Reform leaders in Israel.

Feb. 19

• The Interior Ministry announced it was taking special measures to respond to an anticipated rise in immigration from the former Soviet Union.

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is pressing for the establishment of a six-to-eight-person committee to try to find ways to resolve tensions between the haredi community and the Supreme Court.

• A dovish former university professor who was Israel's ambassador to Madrid, Shlomo Ben-Ami, has won the top spot in the Labor party's primary elections. He is followed by: Dr. Yossi Beilin, an architect of the Oslo agreements; Matan Vilnai, the former deputy chief of staff; Avraham Burg, chair of the Jewish Agency; Uzi Baram, a long-serving politician and onetime cabinet minister; Daliah Itzik, an influential Knesset member; Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, a former general and cabinet minister; and Haim Ramon, a onetime Histadrut chair, who threatened to join the new centre party, but stayed on in Labor.

• A Labor party rally took an unexpected turn when the party's sole Ethiopian legislator, Adisu Massala, grabbed the microphone and accused the party of racism. Massala claimed that ballot tampering from the party's primary earlier in the week had cost him the place on Labor's roster of Knesset candidates that had beeen reserved for an immigrant representative. Massala accused Labor officials of selling him out and giving the slot to a representative of the Russian immigrant community, a larger voting bloc than the Ethiopian community. Labor leader Ehud Barak ordered a recount of the primary ballots.

• In the contest for Yisrael b'Aliyah's Knesset list, all of the current party MKs who ran, won top spots. Two candidates of Ethiopian background made it onto the list, but in positions considered unlikely to result in Knesset membership.

Shlomo Mula, one of the two Ethiopian candidates, explained that in Yisrael b'Aliyah "we have no need for predesignated slotting on the list for immigrants, because everyone is an immigrant."

Mula said that in the wake of Massala's bitter disappointment over not having obtained a realistic spot on the Labor list, all of the Ethiopian votes could end up going to Yisrael b'Aliyah.

Conference explores meaning of modern Orthodoxy

between faith and reason in the life of a Jew," but "both are God's gifts and we need to receive them both.

"We don't have to give up universality to retain our sense of particularism."

The unique role of the modern Orthodox is that they are religious Jews who view working in the world as a positive religious value.

"Being engaged in building and in healing, in manufacturing and in helping, in raising children and in mediating conflicts, is a vital aspect of fulfillment of the mitzvah of Imitatio Dei,"or acting in the way God wants, Rabbi Berman said.

"We have a message to bring to American society – that in work there can be holiness. If you bring the right kavanah (intent), we can transform the mundane into the sacred."

"We need to invite all of Jewry to join with us in this quest for holiness in the secular world," he said, as his listeners gave him a standing ovation.

What's the next step for Edah, a two-year old organization still defining its role in the modern Orthodox community?

"The issues raised here need to be addressed further," Judy Adler-Sheer, Edah's executive director, said in an interview.

Edah plans to set up chat rooms through its web site (www.edah.org) where people can continue their discussions, and possibly organize smaller conferences in cities around the country, she said.

"There are some large communal soul searching issues ahead of us. The challenge is to create a way to do that, to maintain a sense of community."

Charles Bronfman to head new communal "super agency"

UJA, CJF and UIA merge

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — When it comes to risky start-ups, Charles Bronfman has an all-star record.

In 1968, the distillery fortune heir helped bring baseball's National League to Montreal by providing financial backing for the Expos when a major partner pulled out of an already foundering franchise at the last minute. Bronfman, a baseball fan, was the team's first chair.

Now the Montreal native is bringing his team-building experience to the 9-month-old partnership of the United Jewish Appeal, Council of Jewish Federations and United Israel Appeal, which are in the midst of a merger. These organizations represent North American Jewry's primary fundraising and service-providing agencies.

Bronfman, 67, was nominated last week to serve as the first chairman of the board of the partnership, currently called the UJA Federations of North America.

The merger is slated for completion in April, and Bronfman's nomination will have to be ratified at that time.

The federations and national organizations that make up the partnership are responsible for raising money and providing services for Jewish needs around the world. This week the partnership reported that its 1998 campaign has raised a record $743.6 million to date and is projected to close at around $759 million.

Charles Bronfman

In recent years, the UJA-federation system has seen an increasing number of Jewish charitable dollars go to private foundations, such as those run by Bronfman and his family. So the selection of Bronfman to head the reconstituted federation system is being viewed by some as a major victory in the battle to bring these two worlds back together.

But Bronfman points out that he and his wife Andrea, have always worked with the organized Jewish community.

"I know pretty well who the players are," he said, referring to executives of the major federations and the presidents of the partnership's constituent agencies. "I have a pretty good understanding of the whos, the whats and the wheres."

Bronfman's involvement with the Jewish community may have been prompted by the charitable example set by his father Samuel. His older brother Edgar, is also a well-known philanthropist and president of the World Jewish Congress.

Charles' Jewish activism began in his late teens. At 17, he started "covering cards" for the UJA campaign in Montreal. As an adult, he was the city's federation campaign chair, sat on the executive committee, and served as president. He is currently the honorary president of the United Israel Appeal of Canada.

In the early 1980s, Bronfman served on the Board of Governors of the Jewish Agency for Israel, and most recently he took on volunteer positions at the National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership (CLAL), which he now chairs.

Last fall, Bronfman was the international chair of the partnership's 1998 General Assembly, which attracted 5,000 people to Jerusalem, where it was held for the first time.

It was there that Bronfman announced his own partnership with Wall Street magnate Michael Steinhardt in launching Birthright Israel, which in the year 2000 is expected to offer every Jew in the world between the ages of 15 and 26 an educational trip to Israel. Bronfman and his wife had already joined with Steinhardt in the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education in 1997.

The Birthright program builds on one of Bronfman's initiatives, Israel Experience Inc., a clearinghouse for teen Israel trips founded in 1993 by the Charles and Andrea Bronfman Foundation, the UJA, CJF, the Jewish Agency, the Jewish Educational Service of North America and the Jewish Community Centres Association of America.

Bronfman made his first visit to Israel in 1958, the same year that construction was completed on the Seagram building, a skyscraper on Park Avenue, designed by Ludwig Mies van der Rohe and Philip Johnson.

Today, he and his wife maintain a home in Jerusalem, along with residences in New York and Palm Beach, Fla.

Great believer in Jewish continuity

Strengthening the bonds between North American and Israeli Jews is one of Bronfman's longtime passions.

He recalls how his extended family gave him a special present for his 60th birthday: the Bronfman Mifgashim Centre in Jerusalem, where Israeli and Diaspora youth can have encounters that Bronfman hopes will lead to long-term connections.

Bronfman was a great believer in Jewish continuity before the term was widely used.

Today, the idea of continuity has been replaced by renaissance, a major theme of the new partnership's mission, one that Bronfman sees as essential for inspiring the Jewish community, and for recruiting new blood and new ideas into the organization.

"What do we say to young, affluent, Americanized people," he asks, to let them know there could be "something more in their life that may be missing?

"Maybe Jewish renaissance would be great for all of us," he says. But he believes that achieving this and strengthening the unity of the Jewish people will take "a different kind of organization."

The game plan for that new entity is already in the works: a set of merger documents has been sent out to the local federations for their approval.

The merger will put community fundraising in the hands of the local federations and will give them a majority voice in running the mammoth organization.

At the same time, a consulting firm is going out into the communities to determine "what they want from this new structure."

The report, Bronfman said, might serve as the basis for the entity's strategic plan.

"We have to take it seriously, because our owners are talking."

But Bronfman anticipates a curve ball or two in melding the agencies, which for a century have cooperated closely, but functioned separately.

"It's that human question that's so important," he said, and one that he and the two other leaders of the entity – one volunteer and one professional – must attend to as soon as they are named.

Leaders are meant to take risks, Bronfman said, and the biggest risk the new entity's leaders face "is to get people on the same side, to blend together a group of both lay and professionals who want to go in the same direction" without holding one another back.

More than anything else, however, Bronfman sees providing inspiration as the new entity's main job. Bronfman himself is clearly inspired.

"I think this is the golden age of the Jewish world," he said, "and I think it's now our duty, responsibility and enormous pleasure" to see to it that "that golden age goes on for a long time."

Yeltsin voices support for Syria

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Russian President Boris Yeltsin promised that Moscow "will cooperate with Syria to protect the balance of power and stability" in the Middle East, said Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al Shara.

Yeltsin's words of support were included in his message of congratulations to Syrian President Hafez al-Assad on his recent 99.9 percent electoral victory. This message was given to Shara during his visit to Moscow earlier this month, according to a recent report by the Syrian newspaper al Thawra.

The newspaper pointed out that Shara met with his foreign ministry counterpart, Igor Ivanov, as well as Russian Defence Minister Igor Sergiev.

According to the report, Shara said that "military-technology cooperation" between the two countries is "perfectly natural."

He spoke at a joint press conference with Ivanov in Moscow. The Russian foreign minister said that the two countries have established a committee to discuss Syria's $12 billion (US) debt to Russia for previous arms deals.

The vast majority of Syrian military equipment is Soviet-built.

Shara said that the flow of arms from Russia to Syria is picking up, "to rates we knew in the past," which was a reference to how the huge Syrian financial debt to Russia had slowed down sales.

Parents are most important sex educators, says expert

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Parents are the most important sex educators, says a specialist in sexual health.

Children who learn about sex from their parents have the best chance of developing an inner sense of being in control and becoming sexually healthy, Jeff Bamford said at a meeting sponsored by the Leo Baeck Day School Parents' Association.

"Sex education is part of a wholesome life that a child is living," she said.

When teaching children about sex, she said, parents must trust that their children will take the knowledge and use it wisely. "Keep the doors of communication open. Start talking to them when they are young, and remain interested in their lives."

Children need honest facts, she said, and they need to hear them often. "Giving children correct information [when they are] young is easier than getting them to unlearn the fairy tales we sometimes tell them out of embarrassment."

It is not harmful to tell children too much, she said, because what they do not understand "will go over their head."

Sex education encompasses far more than sex, said Bamford. "If helping men and women to become more equal is important to you, you can help make social changes by the way you raise your children.

"Try to help your son and daughter grow up so they can follow personal interests and choose any job."

Offer young children a variety of toys and activities, she said. "Tea parties and hockey games can be fun for children of both sexes."

She also advised parents not to separate household chores into men's and women's work. "If a father asks his son to help fold the laundry and the son says that it is girl's work, the father can say, 'It's boy's work when you and I do it.'"

Essential, she said, is to teach boys to respect girls as people. "We must also teach girls to be clear about what they want and what they don't want, and how to make that clear to other people. Your home is the small world that eventually will make those important changes in the bigger world."

Baycrest gets major donations

TORONTO — The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (CIBC) has given $325,000 to the Baycrest Centre campaign to support new educational facilities at the Rotman Research Institute.

The major focus of research at the Rotman Institute, which is part of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, is on changes to memory and frontal lobe functions of the brain as a result of normal aging and in the presence of brain dysfunctions such as stroke, Alzheimer disease and other dementias.

The CIBC donation will be used to retrofit the current Jewish Home for the Aged at Baycrest Centre with new classroom and lecture facilities for the Rotman Institute. The space will become available in 2000, after residents in the home are moved to the new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, on Baycrest campus.

"CIBC is committed to the wellness of the communities it serves," says Steve McNair, senior vice-president of CIBC's Greater Toronto Area Region. "We are very pleased to partner with the Baycrest Centre, a world-renowned organization known for its contribution to geriatric care and research."

"The dissemination of knowledge and sharing of ideas is critical to our research. The CIBC gift will help to create much needed additional space for scientists to meet, discuss and present date," says Dr. Donald Stuss, vice-president of research at Baycrest and director of the Rotman Research Institute.

* * * * * *

TORONTO — Hongkong Bank of Canada (HSBC) will provide a $100,000 endowment for the Rotman Research Institute's annual International Research Conference. Interest from the endowment will be used to contribute to a stable base of funding for the annual conference.

The Rotman Research Institute of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care holds the annual conference, which attracts top neuroscientists from around the world who discuss the latest advances in understanding and treating brain disorders such as Alzheimer disease and other dementias.

"With HSBC's generous gift, we now have the beginning of a financial base to support this annual international conference," says Dr. Donald Stuss, vice-president of research at Baycrest and director of the Rotman Research Institute.

The ninth Annual Rotman Research Institute Conference runs March 24-26 in Toronto.

Split pensions, spousal support and "double dipping"

What happens if spouses "split" the pension of one spouse and then later, either of them seeks spousal support?

With certain exceptions, pensions are usually valuated as a lump sum amount in present day cash (valued as of the date of separation), which is then split or "equalized" between the parties. Usually Courts will not order that the pension be split when a party retires; too many problems can arise as a result. What if the pensioned party dies, remarries or switches jobs? What if the terms of the pension do not allow a "split"? It is onerous to set up Trusts whereby the pensioned party becomes responsible for "receiving" and passing on the other spouse's share. Two estranged spouses also lack sufficient faith in each other for that to happen. Moreover, the purpose of family law is to effect a separation of the parties, not to keep them tied to each other until retirement and beyond.

Court assesses pensioner's net worth

What normally happens in these cases, then, is that the Court determines a current lump sum amount, i.e. a cash value, often with the assistance of an Actuary. Tax and inflation factors — as well as the pensioner's age and many other factors — play into this calculation. But at the end of the day, the Court arrives at a single number for the pension's future value in current dollars.

When a Judge adopts such a figure, say $150,000 (not unusual for a teacher, police officer or other public servant after very lengthy service), the Judge allocates that figure as part of the pensioner's "net family property" as of the date of separation (i.e. the growth of one's net worth during the marriage). Assuming that the non-pensioned spouse has no net worth of her own, the Court could award her one half of that amount, or $75,000 (assuming that the pensioner had no debts on that date or assets with which he came into the marriage). There are certain other amounts the pensioner can "deduct" or "exclude" from his net family property, but we'll deal with that issue in greater depth another time.

The pitfalls of "double dipping"

Now, if the pensioned party retires, should he again be obliged to "split" part of his pension by paying spousal support from the very same pension that he already divided with his spouse in the form of a lump sum property settlement?

This problem is called "double dipping" and as Canada ages, the issue will come up frequently. In order to prevent "double recovery", Judge Czutrin ruled as follows in a case called Shadbolt (1997), 32 R.F.L. (4th) 253 (Ont. Gen. Div.): spousal support should only be payable from that portion of a pension that has not already been split (i.e. formed part of an equalization payment). The paying spouse therfore gets a credit for what he's already paid.

As Ottawa lawyer Barbara Thompson notes in her paper on "Pensions", delivered January 29, 1999 to the Canadian Bar Association's Family Law Institute, a number of cases have already adopted Judge Czutrin's reasoning. The problem will be how to calculate the credit in the absense of legislation or clear directions from the Courts.

The Maximum Dimension

Making math fun for kids

By JOE SERGE
Arts Editor

Max Maven is on a mission to conquer a popular kids' phobia. It's not spiders, heights or creepy, crawly bugs. Max wants to conquer math phobia.

To that end, he created The Maximum Dimension, a wacky TV show that uses puzzles, games and mystery to show kids math can be fun.

"The show is not so much to teach mathematics, that's not what we're trying to do," Max said from his home in Los Angeles recently. "We want to conquer math phobia. We're hoping, at the very least, that kids won't want to leave the room when math comes on. We hope to encourage kids not to turn off from math, that it's not horrible to experience numbers."

Maximum Dimension is a funky half-hour show built around different concepts each week like sports, architecture, time, computers, etc. The idea is to show kids just how much a part of everything math is.

Max hosts the show with two curious teenagers, Jennifer (Allison Heiberg) and Zach (Kevin Robson), and two animated computer components, Braque (Stephen Ouimette) and Pi (Margot Kidder).

The show is set in a castle high atop a mountain (in reality, Saskatoon). One of the more intriguing rooms is the Matrix. Similar to a "Holodeck Suite" on Star Trek, it can simulate various historical or fictional characters and places.

Max Maven

"The show is fun to watch and includes a lot of surprise factors. The world is filled with mysterious stuff we take for granted. The show is an exploration of that. It is also silly and foolish, as it is geared to kids."

Max realizes he faces a hard task trying to tell kids that math can be fun. "Math is a cerebral activity, it has to do with perception. That might be the trouble; kids don't perceive it correctly. To them it sounds like a foreign language."

Although he is quick not to blame educators for the phobia kids face with math today, he says math has become confusing for both student and teacher. "Math has a bad reputation. It is difficult for educators to interface with math."

He thinks that maybe kids don't understand math because their parents also don't relate to it. "My father is an astrophysicist and I grew up in a household rich in intellectual pursuits. I was introduced to recreational math at an early age."

He says there is very little different between the math whiz Max on the show and Max in real life. "The Max on the show is an elaboration of me; hopefully, I'm not as fixated as he is. He is enamored by mathematics. I also have a genuine interest in mathematics and an appreciation of math in the world around me."

Besides being a math whiz, Max is also a magician and a mentalist, doing mind readings on stage in clubs worldwide. "Theatrical magic is based on many principles, it is more than sleight of hand. Magic also contains psychology. To create an illusion, say of a woman being levitated, in addition to the technology you need to enhance a person's psychology to believe the woman is being levitated."

Max borrows from his nightclub experience and uses such math games and puzzles as the centrepiece of his TV show. He's also no stranger to television; he's starred in a series in Taiwan, hosted a talk show in England and guest starred on Mork and Mindy and Fresh Prince of Bel-Air.

"I started having discussions with people on doing a math show dealing with kids," he said, pointing out he minored in early childhood education at university. It took about six years before he got the show, which debuted on TVO last year, on the air. It is currently airing on TVO Wednesdays at 6:30 p.m.

A feminist fighter par excellence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Feisty feminist and prize-winning newspaper columnist Michele Landsberg was once given a piece of advice by her conformist mother. "Little ladies," she said, "don't ever talk back."

Landsberg has flouted her mother's admonition with a vengeance. In the Hebrew tradition of Tikun Olam, Landsberg burns with a desire "to fix things" and improve the world.

Never shy to speak out, she has committed herself to an array of causes and spoken out on behalf of the afflicted, be they victims of violence, poverty or bureaucratic callousness.

On March 3 at 9 p.m., less than a week before International Women's Day, this pugnacious yet sensitive rebel with a cause, is profiled by Vision TV in an excellent one-hour documentary by Donna Davey entitled Michele Landsberg: Iron in her Soul.

The film not only focuses on her life, but on the issues which have driven her passion for social justice: human rights, education, immigrants and women.

She was born in Toronto and came from a long line of Russian Jews who, while not very religiously observant, had a prophetic approach to being Jewish.

Her mother, now in her 90s, wanted Landsberg to be a "perfect, beautiful woman." Her father, a frustrated salesman, imparted a love for the written word and a mental toughness to his impressionable daughter.

Recalling her childhood, Landsberg says that Toronto in the 1940s was a city where open anti-Semitism was commonplace and completely accepted. A teacher, she remembers with a certain bitterness, referred to her and two other Jewish students as "heathens."

A member of a Zionist youth group, Landsberg spent a year on a kibbutz in Israel, her first major political commitment. A guard tried to rape her, alienating Landsberg from a country in which she thought she would feel at home.

The first woman in her family to attend university, Landsberg graduated from the University of Toronto in 1962. Thanks to an interest in poetry, she landed a job with The Globe and Mail, which launched her career in journalism.

Landsberg has since written for Chatelaine magazine and, currently, she turns out a twice-weekly, avidly-read column for The Toronto Star, a vehicle for her ideas.

Through her involvement with the New Democratic Party (NDP), she met her husband, Stephen Lewis. They have had three children, and they talk about her with unfeigned love and admiration.

Lewis, who was the Ontario NDP leader and Canada's ambassador to the United Nations, speaks glowingly of his wife, describing her as his "ideological anchor" and life-long companion.

Feminists like Gloria Steinem and Judy Rebick also provide thumbnail assessments.

Landsberg's terrifying bout with breast cancer in 1994, and the strength and solace she found in gardening, is perhaps the most moving segment.

It drives home the point that Michele Landsberg, who has touched hearts and made a difference, is a fighter par excellence.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

LIFE IS BEAUTIFUL RAISES IMPORTANT QUESTIONS

Nominated for seven Academy Awards, Roberto Benigni's Life is Beautiful will almost certainly come away a winner during the Oscar ceremonies this month, possibly as best foreign picture, or even best picture. Benigni also received nominations for best director, best actor and best screenplay.

Life Is Beautiful has won critical acclaim in Israel, Europe and North America. In doing so, it has also raised some pointed questions about art and the Holocaust.

Two or three decades ago, few artists dared to touch the Holocaust (Elie Wiesel being a notable exception). It was considered infertile ground for art, a no-man's land of forbidden emotions and pain too deep for artists to explore.

"No poetry after Auschwitz," was philosopher Theodor Adorno's famed maxim, implying that most vocabularies and normal modes of artistic expression were inappropriate when applied against the most atrocious genocide of history.

The Holocaust stepped over the threshold of popular culture sometime in the 1970s with the popular television series, Holocaust and books like Helen Epstein's pioneering Children of the Holocaust. Since then, the Holocaust has become an increasingly common theme in art, represented in novels and films like Sophie's Choice, Fugitive Pieces and Schindler's List.

A comedy that replaces pain and terror with romance and wit, Life Is Beautiful seems to remove one more stricture about how the Holocaust may be depicted in art. Jeffrey Shandler, a New York University professor who has written a book about the Holocaust and television, asserts that the Holocaust has become part of the moral landscape of western culture and that everyone has a right to respond to it in ways that may be unexpected.

"We shouldn't assume that there are approaches to representing the Holocaust that are inherently untenable – for example, that you can't have a comic, playful approach to the subject, as in the case of Life Is Beautiful," Shandler said in a recent interview.

"Instead, it's valuable to discuss how such presentations work on their own terms."

A Catholic, Benigni was asked if he felt that playing a Jew in a concentration camp required special daring. "The Holocaust belongs to everyone," he said. "I am a man, and therefore it belongs to me."

Whereas many in our community may still feel protective and somewhat possessive of the Shoah, we have been astonishingly successful in raising awareness about it in the wider culture. Writers and film directors are bound to find their own perspectives on it.

Purim Carnival: Ashkenaz, the Bloor JCC and the Downtown Jewish Community Council present a Purim Carnival on Feb. 29, 11 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. at the Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave.

This medieval-style fair offers court fools and sages, a cranky Esther, a cunning Zeresh and a slinky Vashti. Admission ($4 child or $10 family) includes music, games, plenty of Purim shticks and hamantaschen. The public is asked to bring non-perishable food for the Food Bank Depot.

"No kvetching, wear something fetching!" 924-6211.

Free Tickets: Jewish Music Toronto is giving away up to 94 tickets to a March 7 concert featuring the Amadeus String Quartet, to patrons who donate $25 or more per ticket to the United Jewish Welfare Fund.

The concert, at the Glenn Gould Studio at 250 Front St., features violinist Moshe Hammer heading a 12-piece string ensemble that performs works by Milton Barnes, Srul Irving Glick and Felix Mendelssohn.

Donations must be received before March 1. Jerry Nesker, 221-5521.

Film speaks volumes about Ashkenazi-Sephardi divide

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Of all the schisms in Israeli society, none is being resolved with as much vigor and urgency as the cultural and class divide between Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews.

In recent years, Sephardis, who comprise about half of Israel's Jewish population, have made great and encouraging strides.

They have narrowed the income gap, which remains distressingly wide, and they have risen to high positions in government and the army: Yitzhak Mordechai, the former defence minister, is the first Sephardi candidate for prime minister, and Shaul Mofaz was recently appointed chief of staff.

Apart from these telling indices, the Ashkenazi-Sephardi intermarriage rate is on the increase.

Nevertheless, several more decades may elapse before there is true equality in the Jewish state.

This is plainly evident from watching Senyora Bar-David's film, The South: Alice Never Lived Here. It was screened last week at the City Playhouse Theatre under the auspices of the UJA Federation and the Sephardi Network.

Bar-David's documentary explores an integration program, now in its 25th year, which was designed to give poor Sephardi teenagers from southern Tel Aviv, a chance at upward social mobility through the medium of education.

Teens are bussed to better schools in affluent north Tel Aviv, which is mainly populated by Ashkenzim, in the hope that they can improve their skills and thus their chances of personal advancement.

Bar-David, a 35-year-old graduate of the program, zeroes in on one of its current students, Elinor Nagar, 15.

She lives in a working-class neighborhood in Jaffa, the same place where Bar-David once resided. Known as Tel Kabbir, it was an Arab village prior to the 1948 War of Independence.

Nagar, whose parents are Egyptian and Yemeni immigrants, is but one thread in the fabric of The South, which is essentially about three generations of Sephardi women in Israel.

Bar-David's other subjects are herself and Ida Reuven, her 89-year-old Greek-Bulgarian grandmother.

This documentary, though, is fundamentally about Nagar, whose face radiates intelligence, warmth and sensitivity.

Nagar does not have an easy time of it in north Tel Aviv, which she describes as "another world." The kids there don't always understand her, and they falsely assume that Tel Kabbir is crime-ridden and violent.

Many students like herself feel socially unaccepted, cannot tolerate the stress of competing with their Ashkenazi classmates, and eventually drop out of the program.

Nagar, however, perseveres, despite her father's view that Ashkenazim look down upon Sephardim and that she will always be perceived as a "black."

Bar-David, having had similar experiences as a teenager, empathizes with Nagar. So the segment about her own struggle to lift herself up by the bootstraps work.

But Bar-David's attempt to blend Ida Reuven's story into the narrative is contrived and distracting, since hers is not really a tale about overcoming ethnic prejudice in Israel.

In spite of this structural flaw, The South is a movie which speaks volumes about contemporary Israel and the problems it is trying to solve.

Still The Night is still running strong

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though Teresa Tova is not in the cast this time, she is still actively associated with a new production of Still The Night, which runs March 3 to 21 at Factory Theatre (504-9971).

Tova, writer of the play about the heroism of women partisans fighting the Nazis, has been involved in the considerable changes in the new version. She based the play on stories told to her as a child by survivors.

She is currently appearing as Emma Goldmann in the Livent production of Ragtime touring in the United States, and the role she played in Still The Night is taken by actor Mary Ellen Mahoney.

The other actor in Still The Night is Toronto's own Liza Balkan, who won a Dora for outstanding performance when the play was first staged at Theatre Passe Muraille in 1996.

"Teresa and everyone wanted to see if the rewriting and tightening up of the play would work and it has worked wonderfully," said new director Tom Diamond.

In its new life, Still the Night has been produced in Winnipeg and Saskatoon, and following its Toronto run will play at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa for two weeks beginning April 13.

"In tightening the play we didn't want to do anything to reduce its impact on the audience and it still has that effect," said Diamond. "It runs about two hours, which may be a little shorter than it was. We're hoping that a lot of people will come back to see it for the second time."

Tom Diamond

Patinkin plays in TO

TORONTO — Broadway's master song man Mandy Patinkin will bring his critically acclaimed Broadway theatre concert Mamaloshen here in May as a Hummingbird Corey/ Ross Production Inc. co-presentation.

Critics have called Patinkin's performance in Mamaloshen as "the most scintillating vocal performance on stage right now."

Tony and Emmy Award winner Patinkin has an extensive list of theatre credits that include Broadway, Off-Broadway and regional theatre. He won the Tony Award for his 1980 performance of Che in Andrew Lloyd Webber's Evita and won an Emmy Award for his role as Dr. Jeffrey Geiger on the TV series Chicago Hope.

The concert takes place May 17 at the Hummingbird Centre for the Performing Arts at 8:30 p.m.

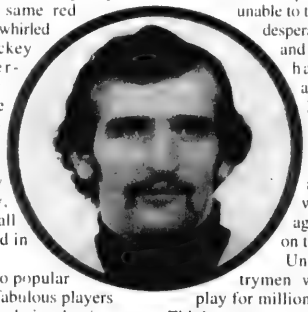
Former Soviet hockey star needs surgery in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the likes of poster boy Pavel Bure skating in the NHL, it's hard to believe there was a time back in the 1970s when Russian hockey players were considered an anonymous, "faceless" bunch.

Clad in their CCCP jerseys, wearing the same red helmets, they whirled through hockey lanes interchangeably with little regard for position. And like Kharlamov, Mikhailov and Petrov, their names all seemed to end in "ov."



Contrary to popular belief, those fabulous players were far from being hockey automatons, as jingoistic Canadian commentators at the time would have us believe.

Forward Viktor Zhluktov was among that first group of Soviet stars who wowed Canadian hockey enthusiasts with their skill and finesse. Playing on a line with Sergei Kapustin and Helmut Balderis, Zhluktov won Olympic gold in 1976, the Canada Cup in 1981 and World Championships in 1978, '79, '81, '82 and '83.

Today, at age 45, hockey injuries have caught up with the swift skater. He suffers from a degenerative spinal condition that threatens to cripple him and confine him to a wheelchair.

Russian hospitals have been unable to treat him and in desperation, Zhluktov and his supporters have looked abroad. The Ichilov Hospital in Israel, among dozens contacted around the world, has agreed to operate on the Russian.

Unlike his countrymen who currently play for millions in the NHL, Zhluktov never made much more than 500 rubles a month, (the equivalent of $3,000 in today's funds) and he's been unable to work since his condition worsened, said Gennadi Kuran, a Russian-born hockey fan who lives in Toronto.

Today Zhluktov pulls down a measly pension of $25 (US) a month, barely enough to scrape by, and certainly not enough to afford the $35,000 (US) fee to cover costs of the surgery, hospital stay and rehabilitation. That amount doesn't even include transportation costs and other expenses in Israel, Kuran said.

Kuran and Vladimir Petrov (not the hockey player), vice-president of the Russian Hockey Place in Canada, have planned a fundraising event to help defray the costs of the operation, as well as transportation and other costs involved.

With the cooperation of the Toronto Maple Leafs and its five Russian players, they are planning an autograph signing at the Centerpoint Mall on Sunday, Feb. 28, between 2 and 5 p.m.

Alexander Karpovtsev, Igor Korolev, Sergei Berezin, Dimitri Yushkevich and Daniil Markov will be on hand to sign autographs in the mall's centre court while the Maple Leafs have provided some hockey souvenirs for a silent auction, Kuran said.

All proceeds from the event will go towards funding Zhluktov's surgery in Israel, he said.

So far, some former Soviet national team stars have kicked off the fundraising campaign with donations of their own, Kuran said.

Kuran, a childhood friend of former star defenceman Viacheslav Fetisov, said other fundraisers will be held until the financial goal is met. A promoter of Russian performers in Canada, Kuran said he got involved after Zhluktov's friends contacted the Russian Hockey Place in Canada and asked for their help.

Kuran readily agreed. "He needs urgent surgery. This operation can save his life," he said.

The Russian Hockey Place is an association of Russian expats which publishes a bi-monthly tabloid-sized newspaper called The World of Sports & Travel. The paper lists former stars Igor Larionov, Fetisov, Alexander Yakushev, ex-Leaf Nikolai Borshevsky, Igor Kuperman, director of information for the Phoenix Coyotes, as well as others on the newspapers' editorial board

Viktor Zhluktov in his national team days.

BJC hoopsters a diverse lot

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) juvenile basketball team is a prime example of racial diversity that works.

"They get along fine, there is no tension among them," said Anthony Chapman, 30, a black coach of the team which has seven Jews, five blacks and four others. The players are from Israel, Russia, Ethiopia and Canada.

On the basis of its record, the BJC team is in the first division (16 teams) of the 72-team Central Basketball Association (CBA), whose teams cover a wide swath of southern Ontario. It will also take part in the Ontario Basketball Association playdowns this year in May.

It would be doing even better if the team hadn't lost its leading player to poor grades, four games earlier, said Chapman.

"Our team is the most racially diverse in the CBA," said Jay Safer, assistant coach, and like Chapman, a volunteer.

All team members are 16 or 17 years old, and represent 10 different high schools. They are all BJC members.

"They are of the same age and have the same life problems," said Chapman. "They get along so well that they are starting to talk like each other."

Two of their tallest players are Nerlya Tsur and Rans Brempong, who both tip in at about 6 foot 8. The shortest (and shortest in the entire OBA) is Danny Hollander, (5 ft. 4) a pocket rocket, who shoots a lot of three-pointers, and is a bruising hockey player besides.

One of the reasons for team harmony is that nine members have been playing together for 13 years, Chapman said. At the tryouts last October, 50 players came out.

The team includes Ijetta Mohammed, whose mother is Jewish; Samir Nunian, a black from Ethiopia; three other blacks from the Toronto area (besides Brempong); Alphonso Christie, St. Elizabeth High School in York Region; Ben Mills, Wm. L. Mackenzie Collegiate; and Ryan Marrest, C.W. Jeffreys Secondary School.

Two other non-Jews are Colin Pyle of Lawrence Park Collegiate, in his fourth year at BJC, and Zack Bajric of Don Mills Collegiate.

Alex Lapidus, from Russia via Israel, and Michael Goldberg attend Forest Hill Collegiate. David Safer and Ari Sargon both play on the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto basketball team, while Mark Dunn goes to Mackenzie.

The team would be doing better if not for its weakness at point guard, said Chapman, a weakness which intense two-hour practices two or three times a week is intended to eliminate. When Chapman hollers, and he does it quite often, the players listen.

Some of the players have part-time jobs and they have to do a lot of juggling to handle their academic, athletic and work duties.

The BJC team depends on its speed and court skills to overcome rivals from Barrie, Cambridge, Pickering, Orillia, Collingwood and Orangeville, in addition to teams from the Greater Toronto Area.

When the team has to go out of town, they travel in vans driven by Chapman, Safer and occasionally an adult team supporter.

The Inside Back

Random thoughts on Purim

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

The older I get, the more I sound like Art Linkletter. Kids really do say (and ask) the darndest things. Cases in point: Do reporters have to know a lot of facts? (It helps, but in today's world of trash journalism, who knows?); does my boss pay for my airplane tickets when I go out of town? (Rarely am I presented with such an opportunity to indulge my invective for the tightwad, but the answer is, I don't need a plane ticket to go to Thornhill); and does a reporter need to know where all the letters are on a keyboard? (yes, because jk$&nasg*$@qv).

These were just some of the gems thrown my way by kids in Dorothy Hartman's Grade-3 class at Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin campus last week, where I was, in effect, my daughter's show-and-tell project for a study of newspapers. Stripped of adult pretense and prejudices, kids ask questions that are pure and wise. What happens when a reporter fails to meet a deadline? What if you get your facts wrong? What about that other Jewish paper, the "Try-bune"? (Oy, to speak freely!) And the biggie: Do newspapers print the truth?

Being on the receiving end of questions is one thing, but facing questions that strike at the very heart of this suffering craft is another. So I suggest to working journalists to ditch your therapy, your Columbia Journalism Review and your periodic retreats to "re-evaluate." Just stand before a bunch of 8-year-olds and tell them that newspapers print the truth. Most of the time. They try to. Really.

Could Rev. Jerry Falwell have picked a better time to announce that the Antichrist is a Jewish man living on Earth at this moment, punctuated by his ravings that purple Teletubby Tinky Winky is a homosexual role model for the pre-school set? If I didn't know better, I'd swear it was Purim...

Alas though, the thunder of my wiseacreage has been stolen. Just as I was sharpening my wit for a piercing bit of satire using the gold mine of material described above, along comes writer Jeff MacGregor, from a journalistic bitplayer called The New York Times, with a column suitable for framing (as is this one, consistently, I might add; although I actually saw it once at the bottom of a bird cage. I swear.)

Intrepid journalist MacGregor got his hands on a "confidential report" prepared for Falwell, in which "private investigators" confirm what the firebrand U.S. evangelist has long suspected: the problem goes way beyond Tinky Winky. Yes, the report grimly nods, he is purple (the gay pride color) and his antennae form a triangle (the gay pride symbol). And – horrors – he carries a purse! Therefore, he is obviously a subtle but poisonous apologist for the gay lifestyle. (These were Falwell's actual accusations – no Purim shpiel here). But there's more: The private eyes unearthed "evidence" that the other three Teletubbies are subliminal spokes-thingies for international Communism, the depraved entertainment industry and, to boot, rampant alcoholism.

Which in turn leads us to such perverts as Bert and Ernie, Rocky and Bullwinkle, and Yogi Bear and little Boo Boo, who, come to think of it, spent a lot of time in the woods together and did not wear pants. Taking all this into account, further probing yielded the following conclusion about Falwell's Jewish Antichrist remark: It seems there's a certain cartoon character "who thrives on the kind of anarchy and confusion usually ascribed to the Antichrist. His name even employs the Yiddish word for a long, convoluted story or series of events.

"It is our conviction therefore," MacGregor quotes from the "report" to Falwell, "that you can announce with impunity at your next national press conference that one 'Magilla Gorilla' is the Antichrist." Megillah. Get it?

Happy Purim.

About Seniors

Ask Jesse

Dear Jesse,

My mother is 91 years old and had been aging gracefully until about six months ago when she started to become forgetful. She had a slight stroke last week and is in the hospital. I do not believe that she will be able to return to her apartment again, as she is very weak. The hospital is arranging for an important test, after which the social worker wants to meet with us to discuss her discharge. She can't return home in this state. What should I do? Where can I place her?

Mr. F.

Dear Mr. F.,

Yours is a common concern. Consideration of placement of a senior while he or she is in need of acute hospital care is usually quite premature.

Many of the strengths that carried your mother forward for the last 91 years may help her to recover quite a bit of her strength as she recovers from this latest setback. Work with the hospital to help your mother regain a stable health picture and the hospital will surely be in a position to assess her needs and to help you to identify the type of living arrangement she requires.

Your mother should also be part of her discharge planning process. There are a full range of assisted living programs in most communities. Some of these programs will offer supports to help maintain her in her own home, while others provide supports within residential settings.

What are you laughing at?

Bill Clinton was dismayed by the errors being made by the FBI. He called in the agency's director and asked, "How come Israel and the Jews know things we don't?" Freeh called in undercover agent Moe Katz and he told Clinton, "We have a code. We ask, "Vos titzach?' – what's happening – and we share the information."

Clinton orders a disguise. He puts on a caftan, shtreimel, a beard with payot and scuffed black shoes. They fly him in a stealth fighter to New Jersey and put him in an old, dented station wagon with an elderly Chassid driver. He's dropped off in Boro Park and he asks the first person he sees, "Vos titzach?" "Shh," the man says, "Clinton is in Brooklyn."

Anti-Semitism prompting unease in Russia

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — The recent upsurge of anti-Semitism in Russia has sown the seeds of fear and uncertainty among much of the country's Jewish community.

Although different segments of the community may vary in their assessment of the situation, most Jews here agree on one point: They are living through one of the most crucial periods since the fall of communism seven years ago.

An unstable political situation – fed by persistent reports of President Boris Yeltsin's failing health – coupled with a steadily worsening economic climate has led Russian nationalist leaders to blame Jews for society's ills.

Anti-Semitism is being employed by both the political left – represented by the Communist party and its allies – and by far-right groups such as the neo-Nazi Russian National Unity movement.

It is not coincidental that this climate has prompted an increase in the rate of aliyah among Russian Jewry, which now numbers by various estimates between 450,000 and 600,000.

During the past three months, there has been an 80 percent increase in the number of people emigrating over the same period a year ago, according to Alla Levy, head of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Russian office.

This increase took place across Russia, according to Jewish officials all over the country. And they attribute it to the combination of two factors: the economy and growing anti-Semitism.

Among these officials is Vladimir Boroditzky, a community leader in Bryansk, a city in central Russia. Like other Jewish leaders, he could not say with certainty which factor predominates in people's decision to emigrate.

Just the same, he adds, "There is a sense of fear, and it has become stronger."

Older Jews – those who remember the anti-Semitic campaigns of the 1940s and 1950s – have an especially uneasy feeling about the current wave of anti-Semitism.

"These people survived Stalinist anti-Semitism," says Pinchas Goldschmidt, Moscow's chief rabbi. While noting that there are few similarities between today and what they experienced 50 years ago, he adds, "They are worried."

Younger Jews, especially those who take part in the life of the community, say they feel heightened societal tensions. But they are generally less inclined than their elders to over-dramatize the situation.

Zhenya Mikhaleva, director of the Moscow Hillel, says her group's activists have all noticed an increase in anti-Semitic comments both in school and on the streets.

"They are less scared than their parents, but they are certainly not happy with it," she adds. Says Tatyana Kaletskaya, a screenwriter, "I don't see any specific evidence that anti-Semitism in daily life has increased dramatically.

"But the situation frightens me. Neither in society nor in politics do I see any real forces that could withstand this anti-Semitic pressure if the situation worsens."

Whatever the generational reaction may be, it is clear that growing anti-Semitism is affecting the daily life of Russian Jews, both in Moscow and in the provincial communities.

Jewish officials say that anti-Semitism – espoused by lawmakers in Parliament, in the mass media and at mass rallies – has created a darkened climate for the Jewish community, especially outside Moscow.

Though there have been few reports in recent months of violent attacks against Jews, they are more often exposed to verbal abuse, according to Jewish leaders.

"People are being screamed at on the streets, harassed much more than before," says Goldschmidt. "I can feel it myself, especially when I walk on Shabbat."

Many ordinary Jews, particularly those who remember Soviet-era anti-Semitism, say the community and its leaders should keep a low profile to avoid escalating tensions.

And some Jews here maintain that journalists are to blame, saying the situation would be less fraught with tension if they devoted less coverage to the anti-Semitism of the Communists and ultra-nationalists.

A Jewish member of Parliament also blamed journalists for being sensational in their coverage of anti-Semitism.

"Much of the situation has been created by the mass media themselves," says Viktor Sheinis, a 66-year-old Jewish member of the state Duma, the lower house of Parliament.

"Whenever I see a crowd of journalists in the Duma corridors, I can be quite sure they clustered" around Communist lawmaker Albert Makashov, who stirred controversy last fall with a series of anti-Semitic diatribes.

Many believe that the anti-Semitism of some prominent politicians has gotten ordinary Russians to feel free to unleash their own deep-seated anti-Semitism.

"Some people think: 'If a lawmaker can say this and go unpunished, why can't we say the same?' " says Viktor Shapiro, leader of the Jewish community in Russia's Baltic port of Kaliningrad.

Some observers are concerned that an already difficult situation will deteriorate further if there are no improvements in the Russian economy in the near future.

"People on the street don't care much about what anti-Semitic politicians say," says Alexander Sakov, editor of Shalom, a monthly newspaper in the Siberian city of Omsk that covers Jewish life throughout Siberia and the Far East.

"But when people go unpaid for months, they are looking for a convenient scapegoat. People are tired, but if they have jobs and get their salaries on time, they will look at things differently."

Despite the current climate, Jewish organizations throughout the country continue to operate freely, and there have been no reports of any group curtailing its activities.

But some Jewish leaders say communal life has nonetheless undergone a visible change in the last several months.

"Anti-Semitic and neo-Nazi activities have in a way, succeeded in lowering the profile of Jewish life" in Russia, says Michael Steiner, director of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's Moscow office.

Just the same, several high-profile community projects have recently been launched.

Last week, the Russian Jewish Congress launched a $10 million project to construct a community centre in downtown Moscow across from the city's Choral Synagogue.

Another community centre, being built at a cost of $7 million by the Lubavitch movement, is slated to be completed later this year.

Mikhail Chlenov, president of the Va'ad, a Jewish umbrella group, sees an irony in the present anti-Semitic climate.

"The current crisis may strengthen certain forms of Jewish life," he says.

As Russian Jews confront a difficult set of circumstances, he adds, the community now needs two things: confidence and a clear vision of its future.

If you're concerned about the Year 2000 Bug...

"Together, we can beat the Bug!"

No one has all the answers.

But we can help.

Your computer
When the year 2000 rolls around, your personal computer could get confused. It could start to read the year 2000 as the year 1900. Essentially, that's the Millennium Bug. Lots of other electronic devices could catch it too, but your computer is the most vulnerable. Hardware, software, operating systems, data – all could be affected. So could printers, modems, and scanners. We can show you how to test your computer for possible Year 2000 difficulties. And we can help you to find out which products and suppliers are Bug-free.

Your finances
Canada's banks, other deposit-taking institutions and related organizations such as VISA, MasterCard, and the Interac Association expect to have their technology fully prepared. They are developing back-up systems and contingency plans to deal with any unforeseen events. If you have questions, you should contact your financial institution.

Your household appliances
You probably don't have to worry about your appliances. The Bug will hit only those that depend on dates to work properly. If you can unplug an appliance and then turn it back on without having to reset anything, it should be OK.

None of your equipment should stop working altogether. But timing devices could be a problem on some VCRs, fax machines, security alarms, digital thermostats, answering machines, and video and digital cameras. We can help you to get Year 2000 information supplied by appliance retailers and manufacturers.

Your car
Manufacturers say it is highly unlikely that the Bug will cause car problems. We can show you what several of the major car manufacturers have to say about the Bug and their products.

Don't wait until you have a problem to begin finding out about the Year 2000 Bug. Start now! Watch for the Millennium Bug Homecheck guide in your mailbox. For more information call:

THE ESTATES OF SUNNYBROOK

Splendor Endures at The Estates

Situated on 52 tree-filled acres not far from downtown Toronto is the elegant and graceful Estates of Sunnybrook. Comprising The Vaughan Estate and McLean House, The Estates provides the ambience and richness to make your celebration special.

The splendor of The Estates is evident in every detail

Here you will find richly appointed rooms, and some of the most exquisite cuisine in our city, along with facilities to accommodate weddings with as many as 150 guests. Kosher catering is available.

McLean House:
Stately Sophistication and Elegance

The history of McLean House dates back to 1929, when James Stanley McLean commissioned innovative Canadian architect Eric Arthur to design a unique home for the McLean family.

The result was BayView – now known as McLean House – one of Ontario's most splendid Georgian-style mansions. Set amid the natural beauty of Gordon Culham's landscaping, McLean House is as magnificent today as when it was built.

Vaughan Estate:
The Grandeur Of a Baronial Manor House

The Vaughan Estate – originally known as Donningvale – was built in 1931 in a simple Elizabethan style typical of a large stone country manor house. The exceptional renovation has retained its historic nature, providing two elegantly appointed ballrooms, each with a capacity of 150.

The grandeur is also apparent throughout the beautifully sculptured gardens, walkways and tiered patio, gardens and stone pathways overlooking the Don River ravine. This makes The Vaughan a photo opportunity for your bridal group, family and friends.

Planning Your Wedding?

With a history of hosting weddings dating back to the 1930s, The Estates' wedding specialists carry this tradition of excellence into the 1990s and the next millennium. Personalized service and attention to detail are the qualities that make The Estates an idyllic backdrop for a memorable wedding.

Wedding couples look to The Estates for personalized service, central location, opulent interiors, free parking and superb cuisine with kosher catering available. Another important benefit when choosing The Estates, is knowing revenues go to research at Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre. For more information call The Estates at 487-3841.

"Boutique Hotel" offers many wedding benefits

Making sure that a wedding goes well involves hundreds of details. Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will take care of them all under one roof, meaning less stress on the wedding party, and more enjoyment for everyone — bride, groom, family and friends.

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto hosts wedding parties of 40 to 180 people, starting at $92.00 per guest, plus gratuity and taxes.

When you book your function at this marvelously mid-sized downtown hotel, which offers self parking after 6 p.m. for all guests of the bridal party, you'll find something special in store for both bride and groom.

The festivities begin at 6 p.m. with a one-hour cocktail reception featuring complimentary piano player, open bar and hot and cold hors d'oeuvres. This is followed by an elegant four-course dinner with imported wine, and sparkling wine afterwards for toasts. There is a four-hour host bar after dinner, and coffee and tea service at midnight.

Also, the bride and groom receive one free room on the wedding night for every $2,000 spent, to a maximum of five nights. For example, if there are 75 guests at $92 each, totalling $6,900, there would be three complimentary rooms for the bride and groom to offer family and friends. (These figures do not include taxes and gratuity.)

Rates start at $230 for a single or double room, with special rates during the slow season. When they arrive on their wedding night, the bride and groom receive a complimentary suite and chilled champagne. Before setting out next morning on their honeymoon, they are served a continental breakfast (sliced fruit, Danish pastry, croissants and coffee).

If you wish, Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will be pleased to organize every aspect of your wedding within the domain of the hotel, from flowers to entertainment. The catering manager will attend to every detail to ensure all goes smoothly. This level of service is in keeping with Hotel Inter-Continental's profile: it's a "boutique hotel" for individual business travellers, families, intimates and small groups (and possibly a celebrity or two in search of privacy and quiet).

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto is located at 220 Bloor Street West, just west of Avenue Road, across from the Royal Conservatory of Music. For more information, ask for the catering manager at (416) 324-5914.

Get swept off your feet in more ways than one.

At Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto, we make any simcha elegantly distinctive and respectfully traditional. Celebrate in one of our elegant reception rooms with up to 250 guests, or under the stars in our outdoor courtyard. And enjoy a special Mazel Tov gift – a complimentary overnight stay for every $2,000 you spend on Food & Beverage.

Adele Wechsler's refined simplicity wins favour

For 15 years, Adele Wechsler's name has been synonymous with elegantly simple wedding garments. Her extensive knowledge of her métier, loving attention to detail, and strong artistic sense have attracted a growing clientele, yet she retains the personal touch which allows her to devote special attention to each customer.

Adele's collection features contemporary special occasion and wedding wear. Most of her business is custom, crafted in house by a dedicated and talented staff. Brides and Mothers Of The Bride account for two-thirds of her clientele.

Rather than overwhelm you with a huge selection, Adele prefers to pinpoint the attributes that will make a gown right for you. If you have a strong sense of personal identity, you'll want a garment that reflects your personality, bearing, and artistic sense. With Adele, you participate closely in creating your gown or outfit.

From her hand-painted silk chiffons, for example, working with the bridal party's colors, you can select a palette in whatever combination you desire.

Pearl braids, hand-made flowers, chiffon and organza ribbons, and hand-draped details are some of the final touches to Adele's soft whites, ivory, champagne and blush-tinted bridal gowns.

Adele welcomes the current return to simpler, cleaner lines, with empire-cut, straight, bias, and A-line silhouettes. Overlays of sheers, laces and brocades over silk sheaths are popular among her clients.

One of Adele's specialties is knit and fabric suiting combinations with silks, brocades, silk crêpes and satins, pearl beaded and layered ombre chiffons. Lace combinations, notably with French laces such as Chantilly, are another specialty.

Among Adele's Mother-Of-The-Bride ensembles, you'll see one in striking ombre silk chiffon, layered silver to near-black, with bias-wrapped skirt, draped bustier and coordinating cape.

Then there's a mink chiffon ensemble with embroidered lace top, sheer yoke and sleeves, scalloped neck, sleeves and hem, straight skirt with short train, and jacket with satin portrait collar.

The Adele Wechsler look is comfortable, yet romantic and feminine; its timeless charm recalls an era of refinement and grace. And you can wear Adele's garments many times, as evening and cocktail gowns.

Bat Mitzvah collection

There's also a junior Bat Mitzvah and bridesmaid collection. Accessories include hats and headpieces, jewelry, shoes and bags.

Adele prides herself on her relaxed, pressure-free approach in dealing with customers. She loves what she does, and it shows.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 17 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 6 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Tuesday, March 23, 1999 at the Premier Ballroom, 9019 Leslie St. (Leslie & Hwy. 7). It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:30 p.m. This year we are happy to welcome Amandalina's Bridal Boutique who will be presenting their '99 collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, featuring bridal and eveningwear creations which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

"There are a lot of bridal trade shows offered to the public," says Kay. "The Celebration of Stars Show" is geared solely to the Jewish community. All of the exhibitors rely on Jewish simchas for the core of their business."

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. You have the luxury of making an instant decision based on what you have seen, heard or tasted, or mull it over and decide at a later date. Many of the exhibitors will be offering show discounts and numerous give-aways. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

LET US MAKE YOUR SIMCHA THE BEST PARTY IN TOWN!!!

Eleni takes pride in elegant brides

Eleni Papapoulias, couturiere and tailor, is known for custom garments which give you, the client, exactly what you desire.

While she makes fine suits, informal wear and accessories, and likes outfitting bridesmaids and the mother of the bride, her special pride and joy is in dressing the bride herself.

Eleni strives both to please you and meet her own high standards. It is doing her best which gives her the greatest satisfaction and enjoyment; and when you are happy with both your outfit and the budget, she is happy too.

She does most of her work herself: every step from meeting you, taking measurements and looking at samples, through designing the pattern, to the final fittings that shape your dress or gown exactly to you. And she listens carefully to you, to learn exactly what you want, and create a gown you will always cherish.

While Eleni works with silk, satin, wool, chiffons and the best laces and brocades, she loves silk best. She uses little polyester, and only the highest quality. Her gowns are known for being both formal and feminine. She works with all different forms and figures; and everyone who comes to her leaves with something uniquely beautiful.

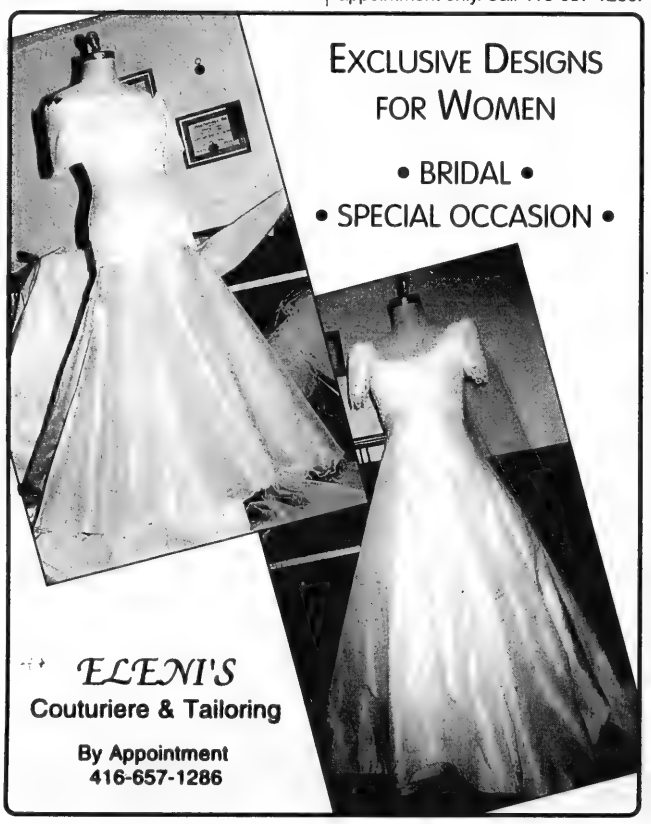
In bridal gowns as in other garments, Eleni observes, there is no longer one single trend: "what suits you, is in fashion." For example, full-bodied women are no longer letting slender women set a standard for them; and taller women also want better fashions.

Not only is there more regard today for the uniqueness of the individual. Comfort is another priority; and people are returning to a simpler, less elaborate classical look. And once you have the look that suits you, details like lapel width in a suit matter less than the overall impression you make.

Also, Eleni rejoices to see clients paying more attention to quality of fabric and work. Both for gowns and suits, they want work and style which last 5-10 years; and this desire for staying power goes hand in hand with the trend to simplicity, which tends to look good longer.

Eleni has 30 years experience, 10 of which she has gained in her own business. Also, with her knowledge of the history of fashion and garments, she draws on an unusual wealth of ideas.

To give you the personal attention you deserve, she works by appointment only. Call 416-657-1286.



Stavros tux is work of art

For decades, master tailor Stavros Theodoropoulos has been creating classic garments. Stavros compares his craft to the art of a conductor: instead of music, he and his orchestra of tailors create fine apparel.

Like a live performance that has more soul than the finest recording, maestro Stavros' work surpasses the best mass production. Your body is unique, as is every man's, so the best garment for you will be crafted uniquely, to fit you and you only.

If you're thinking ahead to a wedding, Stavros will outfit your party to match the elegance of the occasion. He has going-away suits, casual clothing for stags, cruisewear, shirts for evening wear — and, of course, tuxedos.

Even tuxedos, with their apparent timelessness, undergo gradual changes in style. Currently, British and Italian styles are blended in a classic look that favors simplicity and avoids exaggeration; it's sculpted to your body line, with tailored shoulders.

STAVROS
MASTER TAILOR & SHIRTMAKER CLOTHES INDIVIDUALLY TAILORED Member
THE CUSTOM TAILORS AND DESIGNERS ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA

Tuxedos feature subtle differences

A Stavros tuxedo suits you for the occasion, while at the same time imparting distinction. Every tux can be subtly different in details like silks or satins for the lapels; varying shades and textures of black show differently under different lighting.

Stavros tuxedos are made from blends of wool and mohair. Mohair is granular, with more lustre than wool; it's light in weight, but firm, and holds its shape well.

There are gifts for the wedding party too. Among them are accessories such as exquisite suspenders, cufflinks and stud sets; and Italian-made bow tie and cummerbund sets from plain black to bright colors, exclusive to Stavros.

Of all your possessions, garments are the most personal — and the most public, showing everyone the image you project. When Stavros or his manager Robert Kennedy stroll along Cumberland Street wearing what they make, their best advertising is the image they project.

The maestro conducts a small orchestra of fine tailors

Never content to rest on their laurels, Stavros and Kennedy are constantly seeking new ideas and refinements. Stavros recently returned from the Pitti fashion show in Italy, Kennedy from a conference of the Custom Tailors and Designers Association of America.

And Stavros' service is every bit as good as the workmanship and materials that go into his garments. Call 924-8144 and inquire; or drop in to 95 Cumberland St.

Laurentian vows to wow!

It is natural to give someone we care about a special gift. Since jewelry has always been special, we have given one another presents of jewelry since the beginning of time. The joining of two people in marriage is one of the most significant events in their lives and, in virtually all cultures it is common for gifts to be exchanged and jewelry to be worn on the wedding day.

The custom of placing the wedding ring on the 4th finger seems to owe its origin to the notion that a special nerve or vein runs directly from the finger to the heart.

In your search for up-to-date jewely fashion a visit to Laurentian Jewellers is a must. There you will find an attentive staff (mostly family members), whose 50 years of tradition in the jewelry business continues to serve 3rd and 4th generations of clients.

In Montreal, where the factory is located, Laurentian has built an impeccable reputation as a family-operated business. Now open in Toronto for a year, the showroom has attracted many former Montrealers who no longer need to wait for a trip to Montreal to visit their trusted family jeweller.

Michel Korman, who continues the family tradition in Toronto, emphasizes that when buying jewelry, quality as well as price must be considered. "Laurentian doesn't hold sales," he says. "We offer our work at reasonable, fair prices. There are no gimmicks; you can depend on constant, steady prices throughout the year."

Often, customers come in wishing to remodel their jewelry, but not quite knowing what they want. For decades, Laurentian has been updating jewelry by sitting with the client one-on-one and establishing together what the customer's desires are.

Michel Korman, G.I.A. gemmologist, will sit with you and help you choose the perfect diamond to suit your budget, all while creating the engagement ring of your dreams. Not to leave the groom out, Laurentian carries a vast selection of name brand Swiss watches, Breitling and Raymond Weil among many others.

You'll find Laurentian Jewellers at 1858 Avenue Rd., Suite 200, 3 blocks south of Hwy. 401, entrance on Old Orchard Grove. Drop in, or call at 782-3588.

MOURNING A COMMANDING OFFICER

Israeli paratroopers grieve during the funeral of their commanding officer Major Eitan Balhasan last week. Balhasan, the 30-year-old commander of the elite paratroopers reconnaisance unit, was killed along with two other officers, Lt. Liraz Tito and Lt. David Granit, both 22, during a clash with Hezbollah in south Lebanon. Five other IDF officers were wounded. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Painful blow for IDF

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — One of the most painful blows to the IDF since its occupation of the security zone began more than a decade ago – the assassination of a brigadier-general and three others with him in his car in south Lebanon last Sunday – was followed by Israeli air raids on suspected guerrilla hideouts in southern and eastern Lebanon and Katyusha attacks on settlements in the north.

Brig.-Gen. Erez Gerstein, who headed the Lebanese Liaison Unit, was the most senior Israeli officer killed in Lebanon since the 1982 Israeli invasion, when then-deputy chief of staff Yekutiel Adam was killed by Palestinian guerrillas.

Gerstein's vehicle, the lead car in a convoy of officers on a routine visit to villages in the security zone, was struck by a powerful land mine that blew the armor-plated Mercedes off the road as it headed toward Marjayoun.

The attack came just five days after another south Lebanon ambush killed three Israeli paratroop officers.

Brigadier General killed

At a press conference Sunday night, Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz said the air force had struck a target a few kilometres south of Beirut. According to Lebanese sources, the base belongs to the Syrian-backed Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – General Command.

At the same press conference, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu hinted that Israel's action might also include land and sea forces. He blamed the Hezbollah for "systematically violating" the Grapes of Wrath agreement that calls on both sides to avoid hitting civilian targets or using civilian bases for operations against each other.

"If we don't act, the situation will be much worse," Netanyahu said, and warned that if Hezbollah continues to attack northern settlements, Israeli offensive action will continue.

Along the northern Israeli border, residents headed into bomb shelters as the air force began its strikes, and indeed, around 8 p.m. Sunday night, Katyusha bombs flew into northern Israel near some of the border settlements.

Israel thanks Montreal police

By DAVID LAZARUS

MONTREAL — Israeli Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon thanked Montreal police last week for keeping Kurdish protesters at bay during a Feb. 19 protest that turned violent.

"Israel...thanks the Montreal police, who prevented an assault on our consulate there," Sharon stated in a Feb. 20 press release issued by the foreign ministry.

Ariel Sharon

The Israeli consulate in Montreal was the only Israeli mission in North America and only the second one in the world to be targeted by Kurds protesting Turkey's capture of Kurdish separatist leader Abdullah Ocalan in Kenya.

Shortly after his apprehension on Feb. 19, three Kurdish protesters were killed when they attempted to invade the Israeli embassy in Berlin.

The Kurds are accusing Israel, the United States and Greece of helping Turkey track down Ocalan, but Israel has strongly denied the charge.

In Montreal, Israeli vice-consul Barnea Hassid said that access to the building where the consulate is housed – on the 'Increasingly difficult to hear Haredi voice'

By REVA KAISER
Special to The CJN

Upon my return from Israel recently, I was first surprised and then dismayed to see the colorful photograph adorning the front page of The Canadian Jewish News (Feb 18).

Opinion

The photo captured the actions of the Feb. 14 counter-demonstration in Jerusalem. I was surprised because I had expected a fairly monochromatic picture of the original demonstration (the one the counter-demonstration was reacting to), and I was dismayed by the wording of the photo's caption.

The press in both Israel and the Diaspora largely chose to focus on the counter-demonstration in Jerusalem, siding with the supporters of Israel's Supreme Court and against the Haredim demonstrating against some of the Court's rulings. Even the wording of the caption added insult to injury, in writing that the Haredim were demonstrating against what they perceive to be the Supreme Court's increasing incursions into religious life. (My italics.) The clear connotation is that their complaints and arguments are not valid in the eye of this publication.

Unfortunately, the rift between the Haredim and secular Jews in Israel is widening every day, decreasing the chances for tolerant understanding and for a peaceful coexistence of the two camps. And since the Haredim are the minority – and even the subject of much Jewish anti-Semitism – it is becoming increasingly difficult for their collective voice to be heard and given credence to.

Fifty years ago, Israel was established as a Jewish state, a homeland for all Jews from everywhere. But more than just a Jewish lodging place, the Haredim have chosen to establish Israel as a state run by traditional Jewish values, morals and laws. They believe that in Israel there should be no distinction between church and state, since the single characteristic making Israel a state for Jews is also the "church" part of the equation: Judaism. Under this doctrine and goal, the Haredim's complaints and arguments are very valid and appropriate.

But politics aside, many seem to have overlooked the awesomeness and magnitude of such an event, one that I merited to witness and be part of. Rabbis have theorized that never before in modern history have so many Jews gathered together in prayer, not since the days of the Beit Hamikdash. An estimated 250,000 Jews (some sources reported as many as 400,000) converged on the streets of Jerusalem to raise their voices, hearts and souls together in prayer.

Though the epicentre was in front of the Central Bus Station, a sea of mostly black overflowed into surrounding plazas, streets and empty lots. Participants hoping for a better view climbed trees and platforms, balconies and roofs. Though I was a long block away from the bus station (having arrived 10 minutes after the appointed starting time), all I could see down three of the four streets that intersected where I stood were throngs of peaceful and united supplicants.

Although President Ezer Weizman expected violence according to Jerusalem press, the Haredim had gathered peacefully in prayer and to show their solidarity and support.

Prayer gathering

This was neither a rally nor a demonstration; it was a prayer gathering, which opened with Minchah, the afternoon prayer service. Psalms were read, and the service for Yom Kippur Hakaton was followed, with a responsive recitation of the Shema and the seven-time proclamation of "The Lord is God." Afterwards, the soul-searching and awakening cries of shofarot sounded over the crowd and echoed throughout the city.

What was even more amazing about the gathering was the achdut (togetherness) of the Haredim. Religious groups and sects that have long histories of disagreements banded together.

Both Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau and Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron were present, and cantors from both traditions led the prayers.

Chassidic leaders, former Shas mentor Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, and rabbis Avraham Shapiro and Mordechai Eliahu, both considered spiritual mentors of the National Religious Party, all took part.

This is an event that will not be forgotten – not by the Supreme Court, which will have to turn and finally listen to the ever-strengthening haredi voice, and not by those who witnessed the powerful ability of a significant segment of the Israeli population to unite in a time of trouble and turn their hearts and souls to God.

Moe Himelfarb was a founder of Variety Village

TORONTO —Moe Himelfarb, a founder of Variety Village, died recently at the age of 72, after a short battle with cancer.

Obituary

His many years of service with Variety Village culminated in 1982 when he received its highest honor, the Heart award.

Himelfarb was born in Poland and as infant moved to Toronto with his parents.

When Himelfarb was 8 years old his father died. He then took on odd jobs, which included delivering newspapers to help support his mother Devorah and two younger brothers.

After finishing high school, he worked briefly in the garment industry before joining Central Warehousing Ltd. where he eventually became a partner.

In 1952 Himelfarb married Lorraine Greenberg and started dabbling in music, learning the piano by correspondence and writing a few jingles for commercials.

"There wasn't anything about show business that my father didn't know," said his son, David. "He was a closet entertainer."

Along with his wife and son, he is survived by daughter Cindy, five grandchildren and brothers Raye Horenblas and David Himelfarb.

Ontario Conservative poll angers Thornhill residents

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario's Tories have apologized and fired their pollster for asking questions about whether voters would be comfortable with a Jewish candidate for office.

The firm, Canadian Voter Contact, recently polled residents in the provincial riding of Thornhill, which is estimated to be nearly one-third Jewish. The riding won't exist until the next provincial election.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) received several complaints from residents about two questions the firm posed in a telephone poll: whether someone would be more or less likely to vote for a candidate who is a "member" of CJC; and whether voters would be more or less likely to cast ballots for "the son of Holocaust survivors."

The recently-chosen Liberal candidate in Thornhill, Dan Ronen, is the son of a Holocaust survivor, although the polling firm did not mention him specifically in its survey.

Last week, campaign chair Tom Long announced that the Tories are dropping the firm, and he apologized for its questions.

"He will not be involved in the central campaign," Long told reporters, referring to pollster John Mykytyshn. Long said the firm was being dropped because of this episode.

In a letter to CJC's Ontario's region, Long said the questions were unacceptable, and that the Tories "have no malicious intent."

Long said the party is taking steps to ensure this sort of thing won't happen again, and he apologized to CJC and to any individuals who were offended.

His response came after CJC complained in a Feb. 16 letter to Long that the questions "have caused concern and even fear that voters are being identified and targeted" because they are Jewish.

One published report last week said both Long and Premier Mike Harris denied that either the party or its candidate in the riding, Tina Molinari, commissioned the poll. However, another report quoted Long as saying that Molinari commissioned the poll, but that the questions about religion were Mykytyshn's idea.

In an interview with The CJN, Molinari emphatically denied that she commissioned the poll.

"Those who were involved have been dismissed," she said.

Molinari refused to say who commissioned the survey. Asked directly whether she knows who did, she paused and said, "they have

Remarkable explorations

At the beginning of this decade, a comprehensive census of the American Jewish community confirmed the anecdotal observations of communal workers that the number of Jews in the United States was rapidly diminishing.

The findings so shocked the established leadership that continent-wide resources were mobilized, commissions were established and new communal priorities were set to find solutions to the key challenge facing American Jewry: its very survival.

Subsequently, there were various debates regarding the proper interpretation of the census data. But no one could deny the importance of seeking some form of comprehensive and if possible, co-ordinated, communal response to the implications that arose from the census data.

Thus, the phrase "Jewish continuity" was coined.

Owing to a number of factors, the Jewish demographic and sociological trends south of the border are not entirely applicable to the Jews of Canada. But nor are we exempt from all the trends and the behaviors documented in the American Jewish community. The "survival/continuity" issues occupying our co-religionists in the United States occupy us here as well.

But we, the Jews of Canada, through the far-sightedness of many of our educators and communal workers, and the generosity of many of our philanthropists, have erected and strive to maintain an educational bulwark against the rising tide of assimilationist scenarios.

One of the formidable structures in that educational bulwark is the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University and the related, hands-on, results-oriented Programme in Jewish Teacher Education at the university.

Two years ago, in October 1996, the centre hosted a conference entitled Creating the Jewish Future. It was a successful joint effort of the academic world, the local UJA Federation and a determined, generous lay leader.

The proceedings of that conference have now been published in a single volume of the same name. The co-editors of the work are Michael Brown, director of the centre, and Bernard Lightman, professor of humanities at York University.

The book is an engrossing collection of essays. It brings together some quite remarkable explorations into a number of aspects of the modern "Jewish condition" by an exceptional gathering of individuals from Canada, the United States, England and Israel – philosophers, rabbis, educators, historians, journalists, sociologists, demographers, religious, non-religious, men and women, all of them scholars, excellent writers and engaging thinkers.

In keeping with the pragmatic, policy orientation of the centre, the conference participants turned their minds to prescriptions as well as to descriptions.

"We sought out veteran and younger scholars who have devoted themselves to studying the Jewish experience and who at the same time have played a role in Jewish community affairs. We believed that such people would have a better grasp of the needs and concerns of the community and be better able to judge the workability of particular policies that might emerge from the discussions," wrote co-editor Brown in his introduction.

The work is divided into six themes, that move, as Brown explained, across two broad interrelated categories from "the philosophical questions relating to the meaning of Judaism and the 'technical' questions relating to the organizational frameworks for the transmission of meaning."

Those themes are: faith and religion in a "secular" age; the centrality of Israel in the Jewish world; the future of Jewish cultures in the Diaspora; educating for the future; changing gender expectations and roles in Jewish communal life; and demography and economics: the institutional response.

Each of the themes contains two keynote essays along with a shorter contribution that introduces the subject and summarizes the main points of the feature essays.

These introductory essays alone, along with the introduction by Brown and the afterword by Irving Abella, comprise an outstanding work. But with the other 12 "main" essays, the collection becomes both an exciting and an important document.

Creating the Jewish Future is available at most local Jewish book stores. May it be the first such collection of many more. MBD

Anti-Semitic incidents, hate crimes on the rise

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anti-Semitic incidents and hate-related crimes increased dramatically last year over the year before, two separate reports stated last week.

There were 240 reported episodes of anti-Semitic harassment and vandalism across Canada in 1998, according to B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC) League for Human Rights, which released its annual audit of anti-Jewish incidents last week.

Last year's numbers represent a 14 percent rise over the 212 reported incidents the year before, an increase League officials called "significant."

After two consecutive years of declining incidents, "anti-Semitic incidents appear to be on the rise again. It's not just perception," Harriet Morris, national co-chair of the League, told a press conference.

Also last week, Toronto Police released their annual figures on hate crimes, and they show similar trends.

There were 228 hate-related offences in Toronto in 1998, a 22 percent increase over the year before, the police numbers show. They also indicate that over a five-year period ending in 1998, Jews were the second most victimized group, after blacks, with 225 hate crimes directed against the Jewish community or Jewish individuals.

The police say that four main groups were identified as targets of hate crimes: blacks, Jews, gay males and South Asians. Combined, they accounted for 126 hate crimes.

Only about 10 percent of anti-Semitic incidents are ever reported, so it's "painfully apparent that our statistics represent only a fraction of all incidents," said the League's national director, Karen Mock.

B'nai Brith's numbers fell into two broad categories: harassment and vandalism. Harassment, which includes the distribution of hate propaganda, threats, slurs and physical assaults, comprised the largest proportion of incidents, with 198 cases reported last year, an increase of 29 percent over 1997.

The spread of anti-Semitic messages and Holocaust denial via the Internet was not documented for statistical reasons, BBC said. Only specifically targeted e-mail or named threats were included in the harassment category, "and such incidents are clearly on the rise and becoming more vicious."

Vandalism declines

Vandalism, however, declined last year. In 1998, there were 42 reported incidents of anti-Semitic vandalism – a 28 percent drop over 1997. These incidents encompassed graffiti, property damage and arson.

The decline in the vandalism category, said Mock, may be attributed to improved policing and to hate groups' shift in their approach away from traditional forms of hate crimes and towards more high-tech methods, like the Internet.

Society, it seems, has become "desensitized" to anti-Semitism, which has again become "socially acceptable," she said.

The geographic breakdown of anti-Semitic incidents last year was as follows:

- There were 123 reported incidents in Toronto, a 26 percent rise over 1997. The city accounted for just over half of all reported incidents.
- The largest single increase anywhere in Canada was in rural and suburban areas of Ontario outside Toronto, which saw 33 reported incidents – a 65 percent increase. These included a major cemetery desecration in St. Catharines.
- There were 35 reported incidents in and around Ottawa, a 40 percent increase over 1997. BBC says tensions on university campuses were of particular concern.
- Montreal stayed stable, with 20 reported incidents, down one from last year. However, specific reports on anti-Semitic incidents were not available from police last year the way they were in previous years, and this suggests a likely increase in incidents, BBC says, especially since the city's hate crimes unit reported an overall increase in hate and bias crimes without breaking down the victim groups.
- There were five reported incidents in Winnipeg, compared to 18 the year before. BBC says aboriginal people are more frequently the targets of racism and hate here.
- Saskatchewan and Alberta reported five incidents, down from seven in 1997.
- There were 17 reported incidents in British Columbia last year, a decrease of 10 percent over the year before.
- The Maritimes reported one incident, down from two the year before.

The Internet – the new tool being used by hate groups – tends to "intimidate" police, said Frank Dimant, BBC's executive vice-president.

In a case involving a personal death threat against him posted last year on the Web, Dimant said police are "reluctant" to catch and charge the perpetrator, who has been tracked to British Columbia and "is walking around freely."

Officials said the League is continuing to work in several areas, notably, in the continuing spread of messianic Christian congregations posing as synagogues, which are, Dimant said, "completing the work of Adolf Hitler;" and the drawn-out challenge under Canada's human rights statutes to pro-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel's website, which operates out of San Diego.

Marvin Kurz, the League's national co-chair, said the Zundel case should wrap up this summer, three years after it began.

Women's health explored

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Four women were honored by Hadassah-WIZO for their work in the field of women's health. Clockwise from top left are Patricia McEwan, Carolyn Kirk, Annamaria Vuksinic and Sandra Messner.

TORONTO — Women's health was the focus at a recent Hadassah-WIZO event honoring four women.

Cardiologist Patricia McEwan, cognitive behavioral therapist Carolyn Kirk, Annamaria Vuksinic of the Gordon Bell Foundation, and Sandra Messner, medical director of the Health Watch Centre at Women's College Hospital, were recognized at Hadassah-WIZO's fifth annual Women for Women breakfast for their contributions in the field of women's health issues.

The honorees spoke about various aspects of women's health to an audience of 270 at the Richmond Hill Country Club. Funds raised at the event support projects in Israel for women and children in crisis.

Three local shelters were presented with cheques: the North York Women's Shelter, Yellow Brick House, and ASTEH (Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing for abused Jewish women and their children, operated by Jewish Women International and Jewish Family & Child Service).

Coronary artery disease is the major cause of death for women over 50, but many women are more concerned about their husbands' cardiac health than their own, McEwan noted.

She prescribes "aggressive treatment" of risk factors like smoking, high blood pressure and high cholesterol. She also recommends regular exercise (a "modest" amount).

Coronary artery disease in women "appears to be more malignant" than in men, McEwan said. It is also more challenging to diagnose and treat.

Because of women's body size (generally smaller than men's), women's coronary arteries tend to be smaller and therefore more difficult to bypass surgically, she said.

Also, because women patients tend to be older, they may have pre-existing health problems.

From a diagnostic point of view, women often present with symptoms like breathlessness or fatigue that can also be attributed to other causes, McEwan said.

She believes in exhaustive testing. "The pressure is, 'Why do an angiogram if it's going to be normal?' I think it's more important – as long as the risks and benefits are accepted – to go ahead with the definitive investigation."

Kirk, who specializes in anxiety disorders, said her field represents the "number 1 emotional disorder facing North Americans today." Over 85 percent of visits to family physicians are anxiety-based, she claimed.

People may try to ignore anxious thoughts, but "when your heart's beating 104 beats a minute, you're going to stop and listen."

To eradicate anxiety, "you have to be aware of what you're thinking and restructure it."

Although medication to treat symptoms has, "some very strong benefits," Kirk said, it's important to treat the cause of anxiety.

Vuksinic, who was recently appointed executive director of the Gordon Bell Foundation (dedicated to the prevention of addiction) and who is also affiliated with MobilMed Fitness & Health Services Inc., spoke of her own recovery from two health crises, including a bout with melanoma that required surgery and a few months in a wheelchair.

Today at 52, Vuksinic is in excellent health physically, spiritually, mentally and emotionally, she said.

She attributes her recovery in part to a nutrition and exercise plan that she "adhered to religiously." Social and spiritual support were also part of the program. "It required tough discipline," she said.

Messner, of Women's College Hospital, said women have to prepare in their mid-years to have the best quality of life when they're older.

Reducing risk factors for various diseases generally causes women to "feel better, look better and enjoy life more," she said.

The average life expectancy of women in Canada is 82 years – a dramatic increase since the turn of the century when it was 45 years, Messner noted.

It's OK to approach your doctor when you're well to ask health-related questions, she said. She recommended planning in advance so the doctor can book time for counselling.

Messner also addressed the issue of hormone therapy for menopausal women. She discussed risks and benefits, which vary with each patient.

Among the points she made were:

- the easiest choice comes when women have severe symptoms affecting their ability to function;
- no studies show that taking hormones for five years or less increases the risk of breast cancer;
- women shouldn't be misled into thinking they can get everything in a pill.

She advised caution with respect to "natural" supplements and herbs, which are not regulated the way that prescription drugs are.

There is some evidence, she said, that exercise, dietary soy, St. John's Wort, Valerian, Black Cohosh and Gingko have beneficial effects on specific menopausal symptoms.

In Japan, she noted, where soy is more commonly found in the diet, there is no word for "hot flash."

An 'admirable state' does not spurn justice

With a controlled, studied flourish of the editorial pen, the Globe and Mail last week ("Pursuing Johann Dueck," Feb. 23) dismissed even the belated, pitifully modest effort by the federal Department of Justice to root out World War II Nazis from Canadian soil as an act of "political expediency." In so doing, the editorial board of the newspaper, without much nuance, effectively advocated that the Canadian government close the files on all the suspected Nazis living out their last days in Canada and forget about their involvement in crimes they may have committed "57 years [ago] halfway around the world."

In addition, and no less unpalatable, by characterizing the Justice Department's efforts as "political expediency," the board was lending credence to the shameful idea that the attempted denaturalization and deportation of alleged Nazis living in Canada is intrinsically without merit, that it advances no fundamental Canadian values, and that the entire program is nothing more than a reluctant tip of the hat to the Jewish community by the federal government to curry political favor, presumably, although the editorial writer had not the courage to complete the thought.

Both implicit suggestions, that the denaturalization and deportation efforts be dropped and that they were only a concession to the Jews in the first place, are outrageous and offensive.

The editorialist is bothered by the fact that the government has chosen to pursue a civil-administrative law remedy against alleged Nazis rather than a criminal law sanction against them because the former process "requires much weaker proof of fraudulently entering Canada and...permits no legal appeal."

But why shouldn't the "much weaker proof" be appropriate if no criminal charges have been laid?

The answer is straightforward: The Globe and Mail has ordained that criminal charges must always be laid. The only way to rid Canada of suspected Nazis is through the criminal justice system. Denaturalization and deportation of alleged Nazis is always an inappropriate remedy.

The newspaper holds this view even though it knows the chances of convicting an alleged Nazi of having committed or collaborated in the commission of war crimes are virtually nil.

To follow the Globe and Mail's logic to its full course, former Nazis must either be free in Canada or in jail in Canada; but at all costs, they must remain here nevertheless.

We believe most Canadians reject this view as an affront to fundamental decency and justice.

As for the assertion that the process "permits no legal appeal," it is simply incorrect. The proceedings are invested with the protections of the canons of natural justice, including the right of judicial review, which apply throughout administrative law matters.

Nowhere in the editorial does the writer elaborate upon the full Canadian context of the denaturalization proceedings that have been launched against suspected Nazis living here, or upon Canada's woeful record in failing to bring them to justice, or on the more laudable record of Canada's sister democracies in successfully prosecuting or evicting suspected Nazis from within their societies, or most importantly, upon the nature of the acts these old men are alleged to have committed 57 years ago.

The editorial ends with the sly, rhetorical question: "Is further lowering the hurdle because the evidence is weak the act of an admirable state?"

But we may also ask: Is spurning justice and simply acquiescing in the calm, peaceful end of days for the Nazis among us, the act of an admirable state?

Clarifying 'pluralist' context

I applaud your coverage of the Education conference which took place in Winnipeg. However, in covering a panel discussion on Pluralism, your reporter failed to place comments of mine in context, and in not doing so, altered their meaning entirely.

In my remarks, I noted that we are kidding ourselves if we think that our "Community Day Schools" (the topic of the panel) are truly "pluralistic" in their curriculum and policy, for that would mean that each of the denominations of Judaism would have to be taught and applied equally, each presented positively, as a necessary and coexisting interpretive truth.

I then noted that to my knowledge, such a "community school" (meaning a day school, generally, in a smaller community, meant to appeal to a broad and diverse constituency) does not exist anywhere in North America, and instead, most of these schools are basically traditional in their approach while expressing tolerance and acceptance of students from all ideological streams.

I then went on to state, several times, that, obviously, as an Orthodox Jew, and one who is therefore committed to a system of Halachah which insists upon the immutable nature of Torah, I am not a "pluralist" and cannot subscribe to the notion of equal, coexisting truths in Judaism. This, of course, made me a most popular panelist.

Young jobless Jews need help from other Jews

I am very disappointed that the Jewish community in Toronto does not seem to assist individuals like myself (a young, educated Jewish adult) with a job search.

I am a Jewish male who graduated with an MBA in international business looking for work. I have tried speaking to many prominent Jewish business people in Toronto. I read stories about rising intermarriage rates and increasing Jewish poverty. Is there a correlation between that and people of my parents' generation turning their back on people of my generation? Maybe they feel we are lazy. Maybe they feel there are more important Jewish causes. Maybe they feel we should do it on our own since they did.

I feel there is one difference. In my parents' generation, the Jewish community was tightly knit and in my generation, this is not the case. I feel that as long as people my age suffer when looking for work or a wife, Jewish poverty and intermarriage will continue to rise.

Why can't all Jewish dating services be free to Jewish people? Why can't all singles groups at temples be free to young Jewish adults? I believe membership should be free for singles under 40.

A moving tribute to Israel, mistaken or not

Re: the legend to the picture of a small building in Honduras (CJN, Feb. 11).

"To the Glorious State of Israel" is a translation mistake. The Spanish word "glorieta" (from the French "gloriette") doesn't mean "to the glory of" but "bower" or arbour, i.e. a small building in a garden, sometimes covered with wisteria or another kind of vine.

While far from being as pretty as the famous "gloriette" of the Schönbrunn Palace in Vienna, the modest shack in Tegucigalpa wears the proud name "State of Israel Arbor," a moving tribute.

Does anybody know Avigdor Ring?

My family has found out about a lost uncle who disappeared after the Holocaust. It turned out that this uncle survived the Holocaust and sent a few letters to my grandmother (his sister), who died two years ago.

In those letters he wrote that he lives in Canada now. His name is Avigdor Ring. He was born in Kielce, Poland. It is possible that he has a son named Wolf. My e-mail address is danash17@yahoo.com.

Induction at the kotel: "ani mashbiah"

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Israel is a land of many things; not the least of them is surprises. On a recent visit, I ran into people I had not seen in as many years as I care to admit, as well as others I had met the past week in Toronto, but did not expect to see in Jerusalem.

The Kotel too, always a busy place, was full of such surprises. There were the hastily erected tents for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who made a quick whistle stop; the impressive sound system that would do justice to any major rock concert, being set up for a prayer service (led by all the present and past chief rabbis and the who's who of society, which had gathered to pray for much needed rain.)

This, aside from the usual and incessant international flow of pilgrims and tourist groups from around the globe, the brides and grooms taking their ultimate prenuptial photos and the ever colorful bar mitzvah celebrations reflecting the multi-ethnicity of the people.

All the above paled in comparison to what transpired at the Kotel plaza on the evening of Dec. 24. The middle area of the square was being cordoned off as an assortment of stage-like platforms were being set up. Thousands of people began lining its perimeters. Microphones were tested, lighting was turned on, and more people poured into and around the area. I was told that at 7 p.m. (Israeli time of course), the army would conduct an induction ceremony.

It was past 8, cold and late when a bugle blast finally called the assembly to silence. This was followed by a pause of anticipation and the roll of the drums. Then they came. Out of the arch at the side of the plaza, six soldiers abreast in immaculate precision, their steps stomping in unison with each other as well as with the drum beat. They kept on coming and still coming, in numbers that were staggering and overwhelming, in all, over 1,200 uniformed young men. They continued to march on, in rigid regimen, in a military style of subordination and self-confidence.

They came to a stand now, in a silent semicircle, six deep and facing the stage. All around them, their families – fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, grandmothers and girlfriends – who had travelled from all parts of the country to be with their boys for this poignant rite of passage. Boys they were, teenagers 17 and 18 years young, standing at attention, their bodies lean and fit from the rigors of boot camp.

What a sight! As if ragweed pollen had descended, the crowd audibly sniffled, warm tears flowed freely. I too teared, both because these boys were there and because they had to be there. I cried at once with pride that after 2,000 years of persecution, the people of Israel had an army, but I also cried that even after 2,000 years, there still was a need for one.

What followed next was full throttle, high octane nationalism, patriotism and Zionism. To alternating calls of "Attennnntion!" and "At ease," the soldiers saluted as their officers ceremoniously escorted the general to the podium. Again they were at attention, and the flag of Israel was raised. Then a torch was lit in memory of all the Jews fallen throughout the struggles of our people, the general identifying and listing each, from biblical times, to the Holocaust, to the War of Independence and so on. Next, a chaplain of the Israeli Defence Force slowly and clearly read the words of the first chapter of Joshua.

"And it was after the passing of God's servant Moses, that God said to Joshua…rise and cross the Jordan; you together with all the people into the land I give to them. All the ground under you is yours…No one will stand in your way, as I was with Moses so too will I be with you…Be strong and courageous, for you will inherit the land promised to your ancestors…Again, be strong and courageous, keep the Torah, do not deviate from it either to the right or to the left…I have instructed you; be strong and courageous, don't weaken and don't fear, for I will be with you."

As the leader succeeding Moses, now also in charge of the conquest of the "promised land," repeated the words Chazak Ve'amatz – strong and courageous – the chaplain pointed out the meaning of this repetition as of two distinct but inherent characteristics of a fighter of Israel: Chazak – to be understood as physical strength, Ve'amatz – as in strength of spirit and character; two distinct strengths combined.

The chaplain then went on to invoke the spirit of the Maccabees, of the holiday of Chanukah that had just been observed, of the power of right over wrong, of courage over despair, all irrespective of conventional odds.

With the accompaniment of the military band and its choir, two officers per unit began the distribution. There were some 20 units and this is done simultaneously. Two items are presented to the soldiers, marking them not only as soldiers, but as soldiers of Israel. Along with their rifle, each young man receives, as well, a Tanach – the Jewish Bible. As the rifle needs both hands to hold it, the Tanach is dropped into the shirt of the soldier.

This is how it goes: A soldier steps up and stands at attention before his superior; the officer rather abruptly grabs his collar, shirt and undershirt, and places the Tanach into his chest, then he again rather abruptly slaps the squadron's insignia on his shoulder. They both salute and the soldier marches a few paces to the second officer who hands him his rifle; the soldier then returns to his station. This continues until all soldiers have received their arms. There they stand, rifle in hand, Bible on their chest.

The general now addresses them, his voice clear and deep, that of a senior career officer who, in a span of some 30 years of action, has seen it all. His words, beyond eloquence, reverberate on the sheer rock walls of the plaza and touch one's very soul.

"The stones you see before you, the Kotel Hama'aravi, have stared across the centuries, they have withstood the battering rams of history. They stand silent testimony of the insufferable pains and bloody pages of our people's past. None other has ever been so plundered and so persecuted, so much and for so long…like these sacred stones that still stand, no other nation has survived 2,000 years of destruction and exile and then, to return, to rebuild itself into the country we now have today…if this Wall could speak to you, it would whisper the word eternity into your ear."

"I now read to you," he continued in the absolute stillness of that star lit sky, "the full text of your pledge: I do solemnly swear to defend the state of my people, upholding its rules and laws, to follow the orders of duty of the armed service and my superiors."

As the general concluded, the 1,200 young men all responded together with a roaringly resolute Ani Mashbiah – I do swear.

Then, all gasped and looked over to the top of the Kotel. There, a massive tubular metal insignia of the squadron, wrapped in gasoline drenched rags had been set ablaze. The choir, the band, the soldiers and thousands more voices sung Hatikvah.

These are file photos from May 1998 of a paratrooper induction ceremony at the kotel. Rabbi Ben Ayon has written forcefully about the compelling images of an evening ceremony. These photos convey compelling images of a daytime induction ceremony. [Israel photos]

Barriers came down, and crowds swarmed to embrace their sons. What a ceremony!

I find it strange that the prayer for the safety and welfare of the soldiers was not said. No matter, as my lips intone the words said in my synagogue in Toronto every Shabbat; Mi sheberach avotaynou…Hu yibarech chayalay Tzva Hagana L'Yisrael. God bless them.

Rabbi Ben Ayon is the spiritual leader of Magen David Sephardic Congregation in Toronto.

Making the downhill plunge

I never thought I would do it. My peers would try to coax me into their schemes, but I'd decline. I'm not that kind of girl, I would reply. But this time I gave into the temptation. I finally went downhill skiing.

Jennifer Fox in Halifax

I spent a weekend skiing and schmoozing at the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student Union (APJSF) regional convention.

I went to the convention out of obligation. After all, how could I write about Jewish student life in Halifax if I didn't go to the events?

My attendance wasn't entirely a selfless act, however. Since the beginning of February my winter blahs had set in, and I figured the trip could chase them away with new faces, a new activity and hotel housekeeping.

Feb. 4 — Forty students make their way to Cape Breton.The students, hailing from various universities in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, jostle back and forth on the bus. The less-than-luxury vehicle winds its way towards the top of the island, towards the ocean and towards our destination of Keltic Lodge and Cape Smokey.

I've never been on a pair of skis in my life. At least not any connected with snow.My misadventure with water-skiing shouldn't count, since most of the time the boat dragged me across the water as the skis floated behind me.

The reasons for not going on the trip seemed to outweigh reasons for going. I've never skied, I had an exam to study for and after all, I was the girl who managed to break her arm last year while performing the difficult task of walking.

Seven-year-olds fearlessly whiz by me. OK. If they can do this, then so can I. Deep breath in, and I push off, barrelling down the bunny hill. I feel completely exhilarated. Wind in my face, I pick up speed. I am positive stopping is out of the question.

I use the ground as a braking mechanism.

My instructor calls to me, "You forgot to turn!" Oh. I glance back up the hill and watch the kids making wide turns to reduce their speed. Turning. What a novel idea.

After numerous runs down the bunny hill, I make my way to the top of the mountain. The girl beside me on the chair lift gives me instructions about the right way to get off the contraption. "You just jump," she says. Sure, like it's that easy.

When I was younger, I imagined a significant distance between the ground and the chair lift. Classmates would give accounts of ski trips and I would think they were insane for jumping off a moving object in mid air. In actuality, the distance is tiny, and I successfully got off without damaging anything or anyone.

The experts tell me I'm a good skier for a beginner, even though I only made it down the big run once and I almost fell off the side of the mountain.

I thank them for their compliments and for their patience. All those times I needed help out of the snow bank and back in my skis. Thanks guys for not leaving me stranded on the hill.

Of course, the weekend is more than just social. Various guest speakers remind us of the importance of having a connection with the Jewish community. On some points I agree, on others not so much. But I laugh at their jokes, although I'm stiff all over from falling on the hill.

Back on the bumpy bus, back to all the work I had put off for my three-day vacation.

My right arm hurts when I move it, but I can still straighten it. At least I didn't break my arm again.

Time to wake-up (again)

They're ba-ack! Straight from the Holy Land, by popular demand, the Moshav Band has returned to Montreal. The Wake-Up Tour, at its inception, aimed to serve as a wake-up call to Jewish students and to promote Jewish activism on campuses.

Erica Horn in Montreal

Last year, the band toured other North American cities, but students who accompanied them won't hesitate to say that in Montreal it had the greatest welcoming and impact. I am sure you are asking yourselves then, why do they need to come back to Montreal if their purpose has already been achieved? I have a simple answer: You can never have too much of a good thing.

The band originated on Moshav Modi'in, just outside of Jerusalem. Some Montreal students studying at the Hebrew University for the year discovered them, loved them and thought that the band was exactly what we needed – a little taste of hip-hop hot Jerusalem to warm our frozen bodies and frosted souls. And so, after hours of fundraising and promoting on the part of the students, on March 14, 1998, the Moshav Band touched down in Montreal and played a concert few people will forget.

Twelve hundred people packed the club, Le Medley, for singing (in both English and Hebrew), dancing, socializing and essentially celebrating Judaism.

Before you criticize this column for being a year-old news report, I urge you to understand my motivation for revisiting seemingly old facts. The Moshav Band has returned to Montreal because it was such a success. Those of you unable to attend last year (you have no valid excuse) must come see what it is all about.

While not everyone enjoys being in a room with 1,200 other people (claustrophobia, I understand), I guarantee (although my lawyer says I can't offer any money back) that you will be so overwhelmed that the mobs of people around you will fade into the night. And suddenly, you will find yourself in the middle of a mosh-pit, next to a body-surfing rabbi. If this evening is beginning to sound too exotic or crazy for you, then I ask you to read on.

This year, so that the Jewish juices flowing at the concert don't dry up, the committee has decided to add a special event called Stay-Up (Get it? Wake-up, Stay-Up). It is going to be a night of Jewish learning, but not what one would consider typical Jewish learning. We are not going to sit in pews at shul and listen to rabbis and professors lecture on their areas of expertise. Quite the contrary.

For example, my three favorite topics for the night (although all topics are subject to change without notice) are: Don't just do something – sit there: A lecture on and practice of Jewish meditation; Madonna's Second Favorite Activity – Kabbalah in your life; and So you are religious?: Having the skirt pulled over your eyes. Does it sound too much like Jewish afternoon school?

I think not.

The wake-up call for the concert is Saturday night, March 6, again at Le Medley. Do not hit your snooze button. The guilt and regret you will experience if you do will gnaw at your conscience and irritate your insides. No one will stand at the door compiling a list of attendees, but I hope you realize that you know you want to be there. Everybody's doing it.

Then, on March 11, without a schoolbag, notebooks or even a pen, head to the Just for Laughs Museum for a night of invigorating and exciting Jewish learning – a chance to open your eyes to what Judaism in the '90s can do for you. Wake-up, stay-up, and I'll see you there!

If they can do it, why can't we?

Military chaplains constitute an important segment of every western army, and the American and Canadian services engage representatives of the Roman Catholic, Protestant and Jewish faiths. The presence of the chaplain preserves an element of home life for the soldier, evoking a sense of stability. I vividly remember my own three-year stint as a chaplain in the U.S. army during World War II.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

While the Catholics are a single community, the other two groups are not. There are dozens of different Protestant denominations, and the range of religious Jews covers everything from Reconstructionist to ultra-Orthodox. In the military, a Jewish chaplain takes care of every Jew under his/her care. Thus, a Reform rabbi might serve an Orthodox Jew – a situation which hardly would arise in civil life.

Many people wonder just what chaplains do during peace time. I have therefore found it interesting to read the report of Chaplain Sean Gorman of the United States navy:

"Refurbishing a mikvah on a military installation…writing a letter so that a young marine can have extra money to buy kosher food…a weekly Talmud class…Saturday morning Torah study and minyan. This is just a small part of what I do at sub-base Pearl Harbor…My 'congregation' consists of the Jewish chapel on base, nine fast-attack submarines and their crews, the squadron, staff and all their families. In addition, all of Hawaii's Jewish soldiers, marines, sailors and airmen are under my care. Many show up on my doorstep Friday evening for Shabbat dinner. They play with my son. Each one is part of my family…

"I see people who could earn three times their salary in the civilian world, but stay nonetheless. I see people functioning as a team. I see people placing their lives in each other's hands. I see people rising to that challenge every day. I see these same people eager to hear from a chaplain. They know that I care for them because of who they are, and not because of what they do."

The chaplain's wife, Jennifer – also a rabbi, though a civilian – supplements her husband's remarks in this way:

"Our life in the military provides spiritual, ritual and moral support to an uncountable number of sailors, marines, soldiers and air force personnel. Like most younger Jews, I was raised with the little knowledge of the military. We often forget our brethren who put their lives on the line for us every day… The enormous pride I have in helping my husband serve our country as he serves service people bolsters even as I crave a pastrami on rye. The opportunities are boundless, the work priceless and the reward immeasurable."

All of this brings me back to the question posed in the headline. We seem to be talking to each other in helpful ways when we are in the service, and we do so across all lines of individual conviction and practice. But in civil life we rarely do, and in most communities, especially the larger ones, an Orthodox rabbi will rarely sit down with a Reconstructionist, Conservative or Reform rabbi. If we can do it in the service, why can't we do it when we take off the uniform?

The Kirshner File

The Jewish experience in Florida

"Always a view, never a Jew." This provocative phrase slithers across a flyer issued by the Gulf Hotel. A brochure put out by the New Surf Hotel, though a tad more subtle, is just as outrageous: "Vacations are enhanced by the hotel's selection of clientele, assuring you of congenial companionship and contacts with the kind of people you will enjoy."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

These disgusting advertisements are found at the Sanford L. Ziff Jewish Museum of Florida on Washington Avenue in Miami Beach. They call attention to a bygone era when hotels in Miami Beach regularly practised blatant discrimination of the sort unimaginable today.

The museum, housed in Miami Beach's first synagogue, Congregation Beth Jacob, is unique. There is no other one like it in Florida. It opened four years ago in April.

Documenting the settlement of Floridian Jews in historical, social, religious and economic terms, it definitely fills a need: Florida now has the third largest concentration of Jews in the United States.

This fascinating repository accentuates the positive, but does not flinch from portraying the negative side of Jewish history in the Sunshine State.

Found on the outer fringes of the deservedly celebrated Art Deco district, the museum is made up of permanent and temporary exhibits. The first, Mosaic: Jewish Life in Florida, is a multi-media presentation whose focus is on individuals and organizations. The second depicts various aspects of the Florida experience. To cite but one example, Barely A Minyan: The Last Elderly Jews of South Beach will run from May 11 to Sept. 8.

Jews were permitted to settle in Florida in 1763 after it was wrested by Britain from Spain in the French and Indian War. The first colony of Jews was in Pensacola. The first Jewish child, Louisa Meyers, was born there. As well, Michael Levy, a German-born Confederate veteran, established Florida's first synagogue, Beth El, in Pensacola.

It's not clear whether Louisa Myers was related to Abraham Myers, a West Point graduate and a Confederate colonel after whom Ft. Myers is named.

In the mid-19th century, Florida's most illustrious Jewish personality was doubtless David Levy Yulee, who helped bring Florida statehood, who built the first railroad across the state and who was the first Jew to serve in the U.S. Senate. Later in life, he renounced Judaism.

Henry Brash, the mayor of Marianna in 1879, was the first of almost 80 Jewish men and women who have served as mayors. Abe Amowitz was Miami's first – and so far last – Jewish mayor (1953- 55), while Mitchell Wolfson was Miami Beach's first mayor (1943).

Citrus crate label in Yiddish

Florida has had only one Jewish governor, David Sholtz, who was elected in 1933.

Jews have contributed mightily to Florida's economic development. The Florida Cattlemen's Association was founded by a Jewish farmer. David Falk, a native of Tampa, was a president of the Florida Retail Merchants' Association.

Jules and Jack Freeman planted the world's largest orange grove in Sarasota. The plantation has more than three million trees and is several times the size of Manhattan. Speaking of oranges, I was struck by a citrus label in Yiddish, circa 1930, distributed by a Winter Haven exporter with an eye on the Jewish market.

Jews were in the forefront of Miami Beach's development as a tourist resort. Ben Novick built the Sans Souci and the Fontainebleau, two of the finest hotels in the city. Architect Henry Hohauser designed more than 300 buildings, including the Cardozo and Essex House hotels. Joe and Jennie Weiss, supposedly the first Jewish settlers in Miami Beach, founded a famous fish restaurant. Further afield, Wolfie Cohen was the founder of a North Miami Beach restaurant where the queues are endless and the portions are mountainous.

The museum, with its 80 stained-glass windows and Moorish copper dome, is a marvel, and should not be missed. In one or two hours, you can plumb the Jewish depths of a state famed for its sun, sand and surf and notable for its Canadian snowbirds.

Kurds feel bitter

When Kurds stormed and penetrated Israel's consulate in Berlin on Feb. 17, four of the protesters were killed. I read the news with a heavy heart. It's now clear that Israel had nothing to do with the capture of Kurdish leader Abdullah Ocalan by Turkish commandos in Kenya. Israel, which once had a close relationship with Kurdish rebels in Iraq, does not view the Kurds as an enemy.

Israel was jolted by the events in Berlin. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu strenuously denied that Israel had helped Turkey apprehend Ocalan, who had been sheltered by Syria. And in a very unusual step, the director of the Mossad, Ephraim Levy, circulated a letter to employees denying involvement in the affair. Several days later, the media reported that the United States – not Israel – had tipped off Turkey concerning the whereabouts of Ocalan, whose Kurdish Workers Party has been at war with Turkey for the past 15 years.

What the Kurds made of Israel's disclaimers and of the report that the United States had provided the information leading to Ocalan's arrest is hard to ascertain. But I would venture to guess that in such sensitive matters perception is sometimes more important than reality.

Since 1996, Israel and Turkey have forged a quasi-alliance with all the bells and whistles, including military and intelligence cooperation. The Kurds, whose yearning for statehood has been repeatedly thwarted, have looked askance at Israel's growing friendship with Turkey. I suppose they assumed that the Mossad had played a role in Ocalan's abduction. The assumption was not completely farfetched. During the 1960s, the Mossad got itself embroiled in the Ben-Barka case, a bungled attempt to smuggle a dissident Moroccan politician to Morocco.

By the same token, the Kurds who vented their anger and frustration at Israel in Berlin and then in Montreal, obviously chose to ignore the fact that Israel has no designs on them. Israel, while cultivating ties with Turkey, has carefully steered clear of Turkey's internal conflict with the Kurds.

And there is something else to ponder. From 1965 to 1975, Israel, in league with Iran and the United States, actively supported a Kurdish insurrection in Iraq spearheaded by Mullah Mustafa Barzani. Israel sent advisors to northern Iraq and supplied the Kurds with light arms and medical equipment, according to Shlomo Nakdimon in Broken Hope, published by Yediot Aharonot in 1996.

Israel had reason to assist the Kurds. Iraq was hostile, and Israel sought closer relations with Iran. Furthermore, as Eliezer Tzafrir writes in Ana Kurdi, which was published recently, the Israelis used the revolt to smuggle about 2,000 Kurdish Jews to Israel. (Today, the most prominent member of Israel's Kurdish community is none other than Yitzhak Mordechai, the former defence minister and currently a candidate for prime minister.)

Israel ended its campaign in Iraq when Iran signed an agreement with Iraq clarifying their border. The Kurds, understandably enough, felt betrayed. But betrayal is the common thread running through their tragic history. The 1920 Treaty of Sevres promised them a homeland, but it was not implemented. And contrary to the terms of the subsequent Treaty of Lausanne, Turkey's Mustafa Kemal Ataturk suppressed the Kurds' language and culture, a policy his successors have more or less continued. In 1946, Iran crushed their short-lived mini-state, and in 1991, following the Gulf War, the United States encouraged them to rise up against Saddam Hussein, but promptly dashed their dream of statehood. No wonder the Kurds feel bitter.

Jews of the Ottoman Empire

By AVI BENLOLO

Israel's strong ties with Turkey are firmly grounded in the historical relationship between the Jews and Muslims of the Ottoman Empire.

It is therefore no coincidence that both nations have recently opened diplomatic channels and engaged in joint military initiatives.

Turkey's Ottoman Empire was a haven to hundreds of thousands of Sephardi and European Jews fleeing persecution over the last five centuries. Jews were welcomed into various regions and countries within the Empire, including North Africa, the Balkans, Egypt, Greece, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Eretz Yisrael and Turkey itself.

Expelled from Spain in 1492, thousands of Jews boarded ships and fled to various destinations. Many eagerly accepted the offer made by Sultan Bayezid II to have them come live in the Ottoman Empire.

At a time when Catholicism violently rejected Judaism, the Muslims of the Ottoman Empire encouraged Jewish immigration. Bayezid II took a strong stand in not refusing entry to Jews, and ordered his governors to receive them in a cordial manner.

Expressing his opinion about the expulsion from Spain, Bayezid II was reported to have said: "You call Ferdinand a wise king, he who impoverishes his country and enriches our own!"

Clearly, the Ottomans understood the potential benefits of mass immigration. They accepted Jews partly out of economic self-interest, knowing that Spanish Jewry was highly skilled, educated and business oriented.

The printing press brought to Istanbul in 1493 by two refugee brothers from Spain is one example of the sophistication that Jews introduced to the Ottoman Empire.

The empire was perceived by many Jews as the divine gateway to the land of Israel. Still, Jews quickly adapted to their renewed sense of freedom by continuing to develop educationally, financially and spiritually.

For example, one of the most sacred documents to emerge in the empire (with the help of the printing press) was Rabbi Joseph Carro's Shulchan Aruch. Published in 1564, it embodied the codified Sephardi legal usage.

Another important figure in the life of the Ottoman Jews in the 17th century was Shabbetai Zevi, the false Messiah who lived in Izmir and later adopted Islam.

The major centres of Ottoman Sephardi Jewry included Istanbul, Izmir, Safed and Salonica. In 1900, the Jewish community of Istanbul numbered approximately 300,000.

According to one source who was born in Turkey, Jewish life became more difficult during World War II. "Jews were like second class citizens," he says.

He remembers as a child listening to his parents tell of how Turks marched into their home emptying it of all its precious belongings. His family eventually fled to Israel in 1948 with only their clothing in hand.

An estimated 24,000 Jews live in Turkey today. The community maintains a primary school for 300 pupils and a secondary school for 250 students in Istanbul. In addition, there are two Jewish hospitals, located in Istanbul and Izmir, to serve the community.

One of Turkey's oldest synagogues is the 15th-century Ahrida in Istanbul. The synagogue has a bimah in the shape of the bow of a ship. Tradition says that it symbolizes either Noah's Ark or the Ottoman ships which transported Sephardim from Spain to Turkey.

Unfortunately, Israel's sensitive relationship with Turkey has been threatened more than once in modern times, including recently over the accusations regarding the capture of Kurdish leader Abdullah Ocalan, and after the 1986 Neve Shalom synagogue massacre in Istanbul.

First biblical tennis match?

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Q. Where is the first tennis match mentioned in the Bible?

A. When Joseph served in Pharaoh's court.

Oy! OK, Purim is over but Adar isn't. And that means our laughs don't have to end. So today, I continue my look at the best of Jewish humor on the Internet.

The above riddle is taken from Rabbi Amy Scheinerman's treasure trove of Jewish humor [http://ezra.mts.jhu.edu/~rabbiars/humor/index.html]. That's where you can also sample some Jewish ice cream flavors (Mazel Toffee, Cashew L'Pesach, Abba Ebanana) and find out why that chicken crossed the road – as explained by some famous Jews:

Hillel: If I am not for the chicken, then who will be? But if I am only for the chicken, then what am I? And if it doesn't cross now, when?

Woody Allen: I mean, it was, it was…a chicken…of legal consenting age. The heart wants what it wants.

As anyone with insight into human behavior will tell you, laughter isn't all fun and games. Rabbi Noah Weinberg, dean of Aish HaTorah, has created a large Web site about the 48 Ways to Wisdom. Rabbi Weinberg's Way #21: Laughter is Serious Business [http://www.aish.edu/learning/48ways/way21.htm]. The rabbi suggests that laughter plays a crucial role in a healthy emotional life. Laughter allows us to put life into perspective, diffuse a tense situation and even laugh at the insanity of the world around us. But like most things, laughter has a potentially dangerous and destructive side when it is used to ridicule others.

Rabbi Barry Block of Temple Beth-El in San Antonio, Texas echoes those comments [http://www.beth-elsa.org/be_s1120.htm].

Are you too lazy to go looking for Jewish humor? Then let the jokes come to you. Subscribe to a couple of Jewish humor e-mail lists and the jokes will be delivered to you on a regular basis. To get the Jewish Humor list, send an e-mail to [listserv@lgk.com] with the message: subscribe jhumor your name. For Yaacov Weiss' Joke a Day List, follow the instructions at his Web site [http://virtual.co.il/city_services/lists/joke-day].

Do you have a winner you want to share? Submit it to the Jewish Communication Network [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/forum/forum.idc?ForumID=14&TopicID=4] or Jewish Family [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?ArticleID=450].

Perhaps the best humor is rooted in reality. Richard Lederer proved that point when he gathered a healthy selection of Biblical Bloopers – actual mistakes made by young scholars from around the world [http://pw1.netcom.com/~rlederer/arcblpr.htm]. Since Pesach is quickly approaching, I leave you with this (fractured) retelling of the story of Exodus: "Moses led the Hebrews to the Red Sea, where they made unleavened bread, which is bread made without any ingredients. The Egyptians were all drowned in the dessert. Afterwards, Moses went up on Mount Cyanide to get the Ten Amendments. The first commandment was when Eve told Adam to eat the apple. The fifth commandment is humor thy father and mother. The seventh commandment is thou shalt not admit adultery. Moses ate nothing but whales and manner for 40 years. He died before he ever reached Canada."

Jewish leadership

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Adar is a very rich month for Jewish leadership. We celebrate Purim in Adar, but it is also an important month for Moses, our greatest leader.

The Talmud informs us that Moses was born and died on the seventh day of Adar. Therefore, this month contains tremendous diversity with regard to our national leaders: Mordecai, Esther and Moses.

Our rabbis teach that nothing in the world appears by coincidence and so I thought a comparison of the leaders that are significant in Adar might be important. By comparing these individuals, perhaps we can build a model for the Jewish leader.

In fact, through such a comparison, interesting differences begin to emerge.

The starkest difference is in the various relationships with God. Moses spoke to God "face to face," that is, with the most direct communication possible. Mordecai and Esther do not speak with God at all. In fact, God's hidden aspect is one of the main themes in the Megillah.

Moses was raised in a foreign palace and left his status of royalty to eventually join the Jewish people. Esther was raised with the Jewish people and left them to join royalty and live in the palace.

In his latter years, Moses wore a veil, hiding his face from his fellow Jews. Upon entering the palace, Esther hides her identity from the foreigners among whom she lives.

Moses leads the Jewish people out of exile and toward the land of Israel, whereas Esther and Mordecai lead the Jews in exile with no mention of Israel.

Moses' spirituality is supreme and Esther and Mordecai's spirituality goes unmentioned.

The list of differences could continue until one begins to wonder whether there is any common thread to Jewish leadership at all.

Perhaps the similarities may shed some light. Beginning with their upbringings, both Moses and Esther were adopted.

The midrash states that Moses had different names and the Megillah states that Esther had different names.

The name Moses was given to him by a non-Jew, yet we know the Jewish significance of the name. The Talmud states that the name Esther was given by non-Jews. Yet we know the significance of the name.

The midrash tells us that as a shepherd, Moses would worry and save even one small lost sheep. The Megillah tells of how Mordecai saved the life of the king, a non-Jewish leader, reinforcing that a human life is precious and worthy of preservation.

Moses was known for his modesty and the Talmud likewise speaks of Esther's modesty.

Moses' mother hides him from the king's decree against the Jewish males and the midrash states that Mordecai hid Esther from the king's decree to gather the Jewish females.

Although our portrait of leadership has shown various degrees of spirituality, different relationships with God and different community realities, the similarities are also striking.

The Jewish moral code is central, the internal identity is strong and the external challenges are addressed. Both in their differences and their similarities we find a beautiful tapestry of the Jewish leader.

Publish or perish

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

To everything there is a season, says the Ecclesiastian writer, a time to be born and a time to die, a time to plant and a time to pluck up that which is planted.

For genealogists and family historians, there is a time to gather in family stories and details...and a time to publish them for the benefit of all.

Like many things under the sun, the work of a genealogist obeys the all-encompassing Ecclesiastian rhythm of life.

We start by collecting family stories, legends, documents, ketubot, charts, photographs and related artifacts from parents, grandparents, uncles, aunts, cousins and more distant relatives. Sooner or later, we graduate to more sophisticated types of research involving distant archives, libraries and government offices, from which we may reap many additional family documents.

Over the course of years, we gather up many precious nuggets of gold, which we store like pirates hoarding doubloons in a treasure chest. Should we selfishly keep these riches to ourselves? Of course not. To paraphrase the scholarly maxim, we must eventually publish ...or see all of our efforts perish.

How do we judge when our research is ripe for publication? That is a tricky question, since in most cases, a genealogist's work is never done. There are almost always more distant relatives to interview, family branches to discover, promising leads to pursue. When, in short, is it time to say Dayeinu! – "Enough already!"?

Just as there is a danger in rushing to print before the research reaches a mature state, so there is a corollary danger of letting the fruit of your labors wither on the vine. No one can pinpoint the most auspicious moment for you. You will have to determine it on your own.

I started researching one particular branch of my family – the Alexanders – about 12 years ago. Over the course of six or seven years, I discovered many new branches of the family, following the paper trails as various family members travelled from Russia, Poland and Hungary to London, England in the Victorian era, then immigrated to Canada in Edwardian times.

Whereas at the start I had known almost nothing about my great-grandparents, Davis and Blumah Alexander, I felt a great sense of excitement and pride at finding out a significant amount about their life histories, including details about their parents and siblings. For all I had uncovered, it seemed to me that I was still at the beginning of a great research project, with enormous possibilities for future discoveries.

That is how matters stood for several years. Despite my good intentions to continue the Alexander research, I concentrated instead on the Glicenstein line where my inquiries were producing even more rewarding results.

Feb. 14, 1999 – the centenary of the birth of my late grandmother, Dora (née Alexander) Gladstone – seemed an excellent moment for me to publish all of my Alexander research to date. With only a week's notice, 40 cousins gathered under one roof, including some who hadn't seen each other in decades. For the occasion, I produced and distributed a 30-page family tree booklet dedicated to my grandmother's memory – a sort of genealogical valentine.

It was a sweet occasion that evoked feelings in me of both closure and a new beginning. I felt gratified to share my work with a family whose various members had contributed so much to the project, and been so enthusiastic about it from the start.

If you've been doing family research for many years and see no end to your investigations, consider publishing an interim report for your family's benefit. If you've already made some notable advances, don't keep postponing publication of your family tree indefinitely into the future. Get it out into the world.

No doubt your relatives will point out any unexpected mistakes, omissions and printer's gremlins. They'll also fill your ears with wonderful new stories and legends about your common ancestors and the old country. Just when you thought you'd heard them all! In all likelihood, you'll be thinking about putting out a second volume before the day is through.

The Jewish education system

By KEITH LANDY and JOSEPH STEINER

Rabbi Marvin Pachino, a longtime Jewish educator in Toronto, has become widely known and respected for his ability as a teacher and Jewish thinker. However, we believe that

Guest Voices

Rabbi Pachino fails to understand the political considerations emanating from the need for government funding for Ontario's Jewish day schools. ("Government funds for Jewish day schools no panacea," Canadian Jewish News, Feb. 11)

One glaring omission in the article is any reference to existing Jewish community funding for education and a sad lack of sensitivity toward the very parents and students that the rabbi served so well over the many years in which he was involved with the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Let us review those issues that seem to be of concern to Rabbi Pachino:

Government control of Jewish day school funding — Rabbi Pachino expresses the concern that if, in fact, the provincial government extends funding to independent schools it could also remove such funding. This, he feels, would cause serious problems once the day school system relied heavily on government funds to run its schools.

Firstly, it should be noted that the Jewish community has never asked for full funding of its day school program. In fact, our position has been to request funding only for those secular subjects (i.e. history, geography, math, etc.) that a Jewish day school student would receive as a matter of right in the public school system. In addition, Jewish high schools are already obliged to follow Ontario Ministry of Education curriculum guidelines, which are generally adhered to by Jewish elementary schools as well.

Secondly, where funding has been extended in other provinces across the country, there has never been any case on record of such funding being removed. In fact, the opposite appears true. In at least two provinces, British Columbia and Alberta, funding to independent schools has increased over the years.

Government control over Jewish curricula — As noted, the Ontario Jewish community has always requested funding to cover the secular portion of the independent Jewish day schools' curriculum. It has been the position of our Jewish day school system that Jewish parents, as a duty, should cover the cost of the religious portion of the school day, thus maintaining specific control over the Judaic curricula. Once again, a look to the east and west of Ontario where independent religious schools are already funded by provincial governments, demonstrates that no such government control has been established over the Jewish day school curricula.

Community Funding of Jewish Education — Rabbi Pachino, unfortunately, leaves the impression that community funding for Jewish education in the Greater Toronto Area is meager or non-existent. In fact, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto designates over 50 percent of its local allocations – more than $8 million – to Jewish education. That represents the largest portion of local funds for Jewish education provided by any Jewish Federation in North America.

Although the Chicago community initiative to finance tuition for every day school student through a $300-million endowment fund is worthy of Rabbi Pachino's praise, the Chicago situation is not comparable to that of Toronto.

There are only 2,000 day school students in the Chicago Jewish education system, compared to almost 11,000 in the Toronto area, of whom almost 3,000 are subsidized by the community. To provide full tuition for every one of Toronto's day school students would require a $928.5-million endowment fund to generate $65 million annually at seven percent interest, and this sum of money does not account for any growth in day school enrolment.

There is no doubt that Chicago's goals are exemplary and admirable. Whether they are achievable is another question. Realism dictates a different approach in Toronto, where there are both tuition subsidies and endowment donations.

Unlike Canada, the United States has a strict, legally mandated separation of church and state. Therefore, to compare the American and Canadian systems is pointless. Nonetheless, even in the United States where Rabbi Pachino maintains that no Jewish school receives government funds, the fact of the matter is quite different. Grants for transportation, school books and health support services are available to all children in all U.S. schools. Ontario, therefore, remains the only jurisdiction in the democratic world to provide funding for one religious education system while denying all others that same right.

Over 10 years ago, a blueprint was developed for the funding of independent schools across Ontario. Dr. Bernard Shapiro, then principal of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, on behalf of then-premier of Ontario, Bill Davis, completed what became known as the Shapiro Report on Independent Schools in Ontario.

The plan envisaged a method by face to face with Ace

By Howard English

It was a whirlwind visit from the chairman of an $8 billion financial firm. Ace Greenberg, 72, the legendary leader of the New York based Bear Stearns, recently flew to Toronto in mid-morning, addressed UJA Federation's leading donors at lunch, left a large impression, and by 2:30 p.m. returned to Pearson International for the short flight home. Greenberg is, by no means, an international jet-setter. He was just, as always, finding time for UJA.

There's more to Ace Greenberg than the typical business baron. His attachment to philanthropy, which is both unconditional and unconventional, is best exemplified by the innovative rule at Bear Stearns, through which 300 senior managers contribute at least 4% of their earnings to charity.

"It seems like the more I give, the more I make," Greenberg confided. "I receive so much joy from my charitable work in New York and Israel."

Greenberg began at Bear Stearns 50 years ago when New York Stock Exchange transactions amounted to a mere $1 million daily. Today, Bear Stearns is one of the world's leading securities trading, investment banking and brokerage companies, with 9500 employees and $7.97 billion in 1998 sales, which is a 31% improvement over the previous year.

Along the way, Greenberg has contributed countless hours and dollars to UJA Federation, among many worthy causes. He was even knighted by the Queen of Denmark for helping to finance, with musician Victor Borge, an exhibit on Jewish life, although Greenberg can't remember his royal title.

His impatience with pomp and ceremony symbolizes Greenberg's attitude to good deeds. "There's nothing I've done that is particularly brave," he said. "When I think of what your parents and mine went through, the least we can do is help people who are less fortunate."

And with that, the unpretentious, straight-forward and quick witted Ace Greenberg shook hands, warmly chatted with members of his luncheon audience, paused for one final photo, and headed home.

In a city the size of Toronto, it's hard to keep up with what's going on in our large, growing Jewish community. The next best thing to exploring the streets, sights, events and people populating Jewish Toronto is a virtual discovery at www.feduja.org, UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto web-site.

One of the world's largest community Internet sites, with over 1500 pages, Jewish Toronto is a virtual encyclopedia of the city's Jewish character. Here are just a few site highlights:

Care for the Elderly Concerns Community

jewish toronto

Eighty-eight year old Hannah Dawson, who suffers from severe arthritis and failing vision, says she wouldn't be able to start her day if it weren't for a woman named Yvonne.

"She gets me going," says Dawson of her cherished personal care worker. "I don't know what I would do without her."

"The demand for our services is increasing exponentially as the population ages."

Yvonne Grieves is one of 300 home-makers working for Circle of Care, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, which has been providing a wide range of home-making, personal care and counseling services to the community for more than 25 years. Circle of Care also supplies kosher meals on wheels, respite and palliative care, companionship visits and pediatric care for children and their families among many other human services.

Close to 80% of the agency's clients, most of whom are elderly, receive assistance free of charge through the Ontario Ministry of Health's Community Care Access Centres (CCAC) and Toronto's Metro Community Services. Yet, according to agency Executive Director Michael Sheinhert, government cutbacks to health care have resulted in significant service reductions amidst growing demands.

"Things like shopping and meal preparation are no longer covered," explains Sheinhert. "It means many of our most dependent clients are having to find other types of assistance or are simply doing without."

Hannah Dawson has to pay someone to come to her two-bedroom apartment to do the things Yvonne is unable to do under the CCAC's new guidelines, implemented last September. Yvonne is restricted to only one and a half hours a day with Hannah, leaving just enough time to help her bathe, dress and eat breakfast before rushing off to her next client.

"I really miss the time we used to share talking over a cup of coffee," laments Dawson. "Hannah is more than a client," Grieves adds affectionately. "She and I have become close friends."

"Many of the seniors we serve will not complain about the cutbacks," says Sheinhert. "Nonetheless we try to advocate on their behalf whenever we can."

"The demand for our services is increasing exponentially as the population ages," reports Circle of Care President Gloria Clamen.

"One of our greatest challenges is to maintain the high quality of services the community has been able to count on even though funding is more scarce."

That's why better home care for the frail elderly is such an important component of UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty. "Helping to maintain the dignity of our elderly community members is a crucial part of our mandate," notes Naomi Rose, Chair of UJA Federation's Social Planning & Allocations Committee. "Our goal is to use additional funds raised during the Campaign for Fifty to fund expanded services for our seniors."

"Our goal is to use additional funds raised during the Campaign for Fifty to fund expanded services for our seniors."

The agency also provides specific services for Jewish clients such as kosher food preparation and staff trained in the sensitivities associated with Holocaust survivors and their families. "There are only a few agencies that take care of these special needs," emphasizes Clamen.

volunteer views

Even though Sadie Rose has been volunteering for most of her life, you won't find her stuffing envelopes or selling cookies at a bake sale. This 85 year-old great grandmother prefers to participate in social action groups and organize public forums.

"I like my involvement to be intellectually challenging," explains Sadie- who is a member of five volunteer committees at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency. Sadie admits that although she frequents the Centre at least three times a week, her committee work keeps her so busy she hardly has time to enjoy the Centre's wide range of programs and activities.

"I prefer to spend my time dealing with issues such as welcoming new members, health care and the rights of seniors than anything else," says Sadie who will be a delegate at an upcoming United Nations conference marking the International Year of Older Persons.

She is so comfortable in the role of seniors' advocate that she helped pioneer a program dealing with elder abuse and even appeared in front of a panel of senators who held a hearing on the proposed GST before it was passed.

"I've always loved a good debate," says Sadie, recalling her active participation in the Young Judea debating club while growing up. "I never shied away from speaking out for my beliefs."

"Sadie is always there to lend a hand," notes Barbara Zigler, the Centre's Volunteer Coordinator. "She's efficient, trustworthy, always fair and a wonderful friend."

When the Centre decided it needed an ombudsman to field members' concerns, Sadie was the natural choice. But as appealing as the position was, she had to say no. "That would have been cutting me a little too thin. I would barely have time for my weekly bridge game, not to mention my six grandchildren and five great grandchildren."

As Sadie Rose says, there's always one thing you can count - "you'll never find me just sitting around."

Ve'ahavta volunteers to provide relief to homeless

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish & Humanitarian Relief Committee – has teamed with Toronto's native community to help the homeless.

Quoting the Baal Shem Tov – To pull a friend from the mud, don't hesitate to get dirty – Ve'ahavta executive director Avrum Rosensweig last week launched the Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless.

The organization has teamed with the Native Men's Residence on Vaughan Road to take part in Street Help, a long-established effort that goes out onto the streets all night to distribute food, clothing, toiletries and other help for the homeless.

About 30 Ve'ahavta volunteers turned up last Thursday night for a training session led by Marilyn Capreol, president of the residence and a veteran expert on the needs of the homeless and how they should be helped.

Ve'ahavta's involvement is being underwritten by the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation. Bronfman and his son David were among the volunteers present last week.

Every Wednesday night beginning March 3, rotating teams of three or four Ve'ahavta volunteers will patrol the streets of Toronto in a Street Help van to hand out soup, sandwiches, sleeping bags, socks and other items to the homeless. They'll begin after dark and go until at least 3 a.m., and in some cases until dawn.

Other volunteers will assist in food preparation and in procuring clothes and other essentials.

Although synagogues and Jewish groups have collected food and provided shelter for the homeless, this is the first time a Jewish organization will go directly to the streets to deliver aid.

It's all part of Ve'ahavta's mandate to put the Jewish precept of tikkun olam – repair of the world – into action.

Last week's training session focused on the dos and don'ts of helping the homeless. Capreol stressed the need for volunteers to maintain dignity and a sense of humor at all times.

Ve'ahavta's goal is to eventually send volunteers out seven nights a week.

Said Capreol to the Jewish volunteers: "Your lives will change dramatically."

Lewis Moses was a founder of Torah Emeth Synagogue

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lewis Moses, a powerhouse volunteer in Toronto's Jewish community and an unwavering supporter of Israel's Likud party, died Feb. 22 of a heart attack. He was 79.

Obituary

Lewis Moses

"There wasn't a charity he wouldn't touch," said his daughter, Harriet Altman.

"He taught us tzedakah," added his son, Samuel Moses.

Lew Moses, as he was known, was not shy about his political leanings. A former president and treasurer, he helped build Herut-Likud of Canada, and was personal friends with former Prime Minister Menachem Begin. In fact, said his son, Begin would stay with the Moses family whenever he came to Canada.

In 1978, at a public rally at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, Moses introduced Begin, then opposition leader, as "the next prime minister of Israel." A few months later, Begin won the job.

Moses supported many Jewish causes. He was a past president of Jewish National Fund and was an active fundraiser for United Jewish Appeal and State of Israel Bonds. He sat on the boards of the Canadian Zionist Federation and the Board of Jewish Education.

For 13 years, he was president of Torah Emeth, the synagogue he helped found, on Viewmount Avenue. He was also vice-president of Eitz Chaim Day School and was on the board of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Non-Jewish charities that benefited from his efforts included the Salvation Army and the YMCA.

Moses was born into an Orthodox family in Cluj, Transylvania, the youngest of seven siblings. Fearing rising anti-Semitism, the family moved to Paris in 1927, and to Canada the following year, settling in Ottawa. His father was in the fruit business.

The clan moved to Toronto in 1932, and Moses' father established a small synagogue on Brunswick Avenue, the Husiatiner Klaus.

When World War II broke out, Moses volunteered for the Royal Canadian Air Force. Stationed in London, he was adjutant to the chief of the Bomber Command during the Battle of Britain and reached the rank of acting warrant officer.

Returning to Toronto following the war, he became an accountant with the firm of Hattin and Hattin, which later became Hattin and Moses. In 1947, he married Ethel Price.

His family remembers the time in 1967, during the Six Day War, when Moses went door to door collecting money for Israel.

"He was very outgoing," said Sam Sable, a friend of 40 years. "At times, he was vociferous but always amiable. Sometimes, he was argumentative but he never held a grudge."

Fellow Likud supporter Harry Wolle said Moses "always had a sense of humor. It was fun being with him. He loved to share a good scotch with people.

"Whether you wanted to hear it or not, he gave you his opinion. He had a real passion for Israel. Whenever there was a just reason to raise funds, he was there," said Wolle, chair of Herut-Likud's central region.

"He was as willing to play soldier as he was to play general," remarked Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF.

Moses is survived by his wife, his sister Lillian White, sons Samuel and Joel, daughter Harriet Altman, and six grandchildren.

Prenuptials urged to prevent agunot

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO—Having a prenuptial agreement is the best way to prevent women from becoming agunot, according to Rabbi Mordechai Willig, a rosh yeshiva at Yeshiva University and spiritual leader of Young Israel of Riverdale.

Rabbi Willig, therefore, is urging rabbinical organizations to encourage their members to insist on preparing an agreement when a couple marries.

Rabbi Willig was speaking at Beth Jacob Synagogue at a lecture co-sponsored by the synagogue and Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University.

He explained that a couple would sign an agreement stating that if the marriage broke down, they would each go to a particular, mutually acceptable beit din (rabbinical court) for arbitration. If they were not living together, the husband would have to pay the wife one gold coin a week, until the beit din solved the issues.

While the rabbi acknowledged that this method, the source of which is an ancient document that he found, is not an absolute guarantee that a woman will not become an agunah, it at least lowers the chances, he said.

Rabbi Willig said that there are more agunot than there used to be, partly because there are more divorces, and because in modern society the community has no way to demand that a man give his wife a get.

The rabbi left no doubt about how serious he considers the agunah's problem. She is unable to remarry until her husband gives her a Jewish divorce, and if she does choose to remarry, any children she has will be mamzerim, unable to marry anyone except another mamzer or a convert.

"The Talmud says that if a person saves one life, it is as if they established a whole world. How much more so is that the case when [ensuring that a woman receives a get] making a dead-end life full of potential?"

(The fact that a man and woman are not married does not make a child illegitimate in Jewish law, provided there are no impediments to the couple marrying if they choose to.)

He added that although he does not believe that there are as many agunot as are reported in the press, "even one is too many."

Another solution to the problem is annulment of the marriage. While annulment is usually thought of as a Roman Catholic proviso, it is possible in certain limited cases, such as mistaken identity, severe illness, impotency, homosexuality, psychosis, or conversion to another religion, he said.

However, all these problems must have manifested themselves before the marriage, said Rabbi Willig, quoting the late scholar Rabbi Moshe Feinstein.

An organization in New York, Beit Din L'Bayot Agunot, has expanded the concept of annulment to include such things as psychological abuse, sadism (which includes refusing to give a get, according to them), even if they don't show up until after the marriage.

The organization also assumes that if a woman had realized that a husband cannot be physically forced to give a get in America, and that a woman is, technically speaking, "acquired" in a Jewish marriage, she would have never agreed to the marriage.

Rabbi Willig called this reasoning "specious," saying that it is hard to imagine women these days not being aware of what the situation is.

In European society before the 18th century, it was not too difficult to employ sanctions to persuade a man to give a get. If, for instance, a man was forbidden to receive synagogue honors, there either was no other place he could go to daven, or any other synagogue would be nearby and would cooperate.

In modern society, people can simply move to another place where they are not known, and carry on with their lives.

In reply to a question from the audience, he said civil courts that insist on religious issues being dealt with before a divorce is granted are not the answer, because "if there is no property involved, or no children, what can the court do?"

Other suggestions from the audience included posting a recalcitrant husband's name on the Internet, encouraging non-observant Jews to have civil marriages instead of religious ones, and more activism by community members, and communal and rabbinical leaders.

which independent schools such as our Jewish day schools could maintain their independence vis-a-vis the Judaic curricula, and become associate members of a local public school board in relation to secular education and financial accountability. To this day, there has never been an official government response to the Shapiro Report.

At a time when charitable dollars within the Jewish community must be stretched to meet the needs of a rapidly aging population and to assist the vulnerable, the right afforded to at least one other religious group in this province to have their children educated within the religious faith of their choice must be granted to the Jewish community and to all others who can meet the appropriate Ministry of Education standards.

With a clearer understanding, it is our hope that Rabbi Pachino will join the vast majority of our community in our continuing efforts to advocate for government funding of independent schools which is equal to the public and Roman Catholic systems. The time has come to right this historical wrong.

Local kids spar in friendly Bible contest

Eight teams from five supplementary schools participate

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — On a recent Sunday morning eight teams of students from five supplementary schools in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) sparred in the local Bible contest.

The event, sponsored by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE), was held at Netivot HaTorah Hebrew Day School in Thornhill.

Forty contestants, ranging from grades 5 to 8, participated in the Bible contest, which tested their knowledge on Genesis.

Some 50 spectators – many from downtown Toronto and some from as far away as Mississauga – made the trek to Thornhill to support the teams.

The participating schools were Beth Tikvah Synagogue School, Holy Blossom Temple Religious School, Temple Kol Ami Religious School, Bet Sefer Solel and the Downtown Jewish Community School (DJCS), which fielded four teams.

Joyce Levine, director of interschool programming at the BJE, was pleased with the results of the contest because all the students did well, she said.

While Beth Tikvah came first for the fourth consecutive year, Levine noted that the scores were very close among the top three teams. The DJCS and Holy Blossom were second and third consecutively.

Referring to the four consecutive wins for Beth Tikvah, Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, the BJE's executive director, called the team "the New York Yankees of Torah," but he was quick to point out that all the participants were winners.

"It's important that you decided to take it upon yourself to study," Rabbi Unterman said. "This is not a question of winning or losing... It's about how much knowledge you have gained about your heritage."

The members of the Beth Tikvah team were Erica Rosenfield, Abby Goldberg, Jeffrey Heifetz, and brothers Adam and Josh Silver. Abby Brown coached the team.

Brown was thrilled with the win, she said. "I thought it was really exciting. The kids were enthusiastic. They really did well in the oral and written parts."

Samuel Kapustin, principal of Beth Tikvah said he was proud of the students. The win was "a matter of hard work and dedication."

He commended the coach, but stressed that most of the work is done at home.

The local Bible contest was held on the same day as the preliminary written exams for the regional Bible contest.

More than 200 children in the GTA – both day and supplementary school students – along with additional participants across Canada, took the written test. They were all qualifying for the national contest which takes place in Montreal in April.

Grades 5 and 6 are tested on Genesis, but the scope of the test material increases with the students' age: grades 7 and 8 students learn Joshua as well as Genesis, while students in grades 9 to OAC are tested on those books, as well as Isaiah, Amos and the Psalms, Levine noted.

She said another oral contest – an elimination round for grades 5 and 6 day school students – is to take place on March 14 at Netivot Hatorah.

She expects approximately 80 students from the GTA to compete in the national Bible contest in Montreal in May. The grand prize winner will represent Canada in the international Bible competition to be held in Israel.

Zimriya music festival draws over 400 children

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The voices of more than 400 children singing about the beauty of Israel recently filled the sanctuary of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

The nachas of hundreds of family members on hand to watch their children perform was almost palpable.

Eleven schools participated in Zimriya 1999, the annual music festival of the day and supplementary Hebrew schools sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) of UJA Federation.

The participating schools included She'arim Hebrew Day School, United Synagogue Day School (USDS), United Congregational Schools, Associated Hebrew Schools, Leo Baeck Day Schools, Downtown Jewish Community School, Beit Rayim Hebrew School, Netivot Hatorah Day School, Shaar Shalom Religious School and Bialik Hebrew Day School.

The festival was divided into afternoon and morning concerts. Both included performances by the festival choirs, which were made up of children from all participating schools. There was also a special presentation with students from the various schools conducted by Bryna Bruder.

BJE director of interschool programming Joyce Levine, coordinator of the zimriya, said everything went very smoothly and the performance was excellent "It went great. The kids were so excited. You could see it on their faces."

BJE executive director, Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, told the audience that these Hebrew songs will remain with the children "all their lives," but he urged parents to reinforce the experience by sending their children to Jewish camps and on "quality trips to Israel. Let this not be just a dream that goes unfulfilled," he said.

Nella Koren, choir conductor for Bialik and USDS, also conducted the festival choirs. She said she rehearses all the parts of the festival choirs with schools individually and they come together for one joint rehearsal before the zimriya.

She noted that the children always sound best when they perform in front of an audience.

The festival choir songs were arranged by Doron Ophir, a driving force behind the zimriya for years.

Although Ophir moved back to Israel a year and a half ago, he still maintains a hand in the festival, compiling songs for the theme, and arranging the music for the festival choir, Levine said.

"Even though he is in Israel, he feels a connection to Toronto. He still wants to be part of the zimriya."

Stage manager of the zimriya, Shula Saltzman, senior educational consultant for Canadian Jewish Congress was pleased that everything went so well, she said.

She said that after months of hard work, the children did a "wonderful" job. She stressed that performing is a very important experience for the children.

"The kids did a great job. They sang beautifully. The parents enjoyed it. What more can you ask for?"

Matas urges Canada to help find Wallenberg

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The fate of Raoul Wallenberg is "locked behind closed doors," and the Canadian government has been asked to help find the truth.

Human rights activist David Matas of Winnipeg has asked Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy to sign a memorandum between Canada, Russia and Sweden to discover the fate of Wallenberg, who was made an honorary Canadian citizen in 1985.

Speaking recently to the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada, Matas said Moscow is hiding information on Wallenberg in the same way it does on war crimes.

He has asked Axworthy to use Canadians researching war crimes in Russia to help discover what happened to Wallenberg.

"It would be a tragedy if nothing is done to learn the fate of Wallenberg, considering he saved 100,000 Jews," he said. "It would be a slap in the face of those he saved – more than any government did."

Wallenberg was dispatched to Budapest in 1944. Using fake Swedish passports, and persuading the Nazis to call off the destruction of Budapest's Jewish ghetto, he saved the lives of as many as 100,000 Jews.

He was arrested by the Soviets in 1945 and was never heard from again.

Matas said that a government grant of $5,000, and the official status that gave him, opened doors in Russia for him on a recent visit.

He said he had as hard a time in Sweden as he did in Russia in trying to learn details about what happened to the Swedish hero. He said he was mystified by the Swedish government's attitude.

"I don't know why we can't learn any more about Wallenberg's past before he went to Budapest than we can from Russia after his arrest in Budapest in 1945," he said.

Various stories have circulated, including that Wallenberg represented a firm that was trading with the enemy, and that he was not sent to help Jews but to pursue the business interests of his company, Matas said.

He said he can't understand why Wallenberg was the one Swedish national not exchanged with Russia after the war.

Russia says it doesn't know what happened to Wallenberg, which is unsatisfactory, Matas said.

"They have stopped claiming that he was killed in a car accident in Budapest or that he died after a heart attack in Lubianka prison in 1947, which were out and out lies."

Describing his fate as "unknown but knowable," Matas said if Wallenberg were alive today, he would be 86, and because of his medical history, he would be a patient in a mental hospital. Russia has conceded that Wallenberg suffered a breakdown in the gulag, he said.

"We know that Wallenberg was alive in 1947, but we don't know what happened after that. The Russians will only confirm real evidence that is confirmed through other sources."

It was not until 1957 that Russia admitted Wallenberg had been arrested on the orders of Marshal Nikolai Bulganin, the number 2 man in the country.

Matas said his research has shown that Wallenberg was recruited by the U.S. Office of Strategic Services, a forerunner of the CIA, under an American plan to save Jews.

"I do not believe Wallenberg was ever an American spy," Matas said. But, he added, the Soviets had legitimate reasons for arresting him because Wallenberg had had contact with the Nazis.

"It is possible that he was alive after 1947, even though the prison records don't show it. In Russia there was a system of secret prisoners identified only by number; even the jailers didn't know who they were."

Hillel and JCS get set to formalize relationship

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A recent visit by Jay Rubin, executive vice-president of Hillel, The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, marked the beginning of a process expected to result in a formalized relationship between Hillel and Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS).

In the past few years, Hillel has worked closely with JCS and treated it "as virtually a Hillel associate," providing grants and other benefits, Rubin told The CJN.

Hillel, which has a longtime presence in Vancouver and Montreal, is a 75-year-old international umbrella based in Washington, D.C., with affiliates as far afield as the former Soviet Union.

A number of smaller Canadian campus groups have worked with the organization through its Soref Initiative for Emerging Hillel Campuses. The project offers grants, programming resources and consulting services to campuses typically having fewer than 500 Jewish students, a category encompassing some 300 campuses in the United States and about 27 in Canada.

Rubin's two-day visit to Toronto, at the invitation of Zac Kaye, JCS executive director, included meetings with the staff of UJA Federation and the JCS board. The latter voted unanimously to seek affiliation with Hillel. Its request will be raised with Hillel's board next month.

Subject to Hillel accreditation, JCS will be able to avail itself of a wider variety of services from Washington and will also be "full participants in decision making," said Rubin.

Since the mid-1990s, there has been a formal relationship between Hillel and the campus committee of UIA Federations Canada.

Since 1990, when B'nai Brith Canada withdrew funding from what was then known as Hillel at the University of Toronto, there has been no formal affiliation here.

In 1995, when Kaye was hired, there was a restructuring of campus services in the city.

Over the past decade, said Rubin, Hillel has undergone its own renaissance. "It has become less of a club and more of an infrastructure."

The focus now is on connecting in a variety of Jewish areas – like theatre, community service and the different denominational movements – reflecting different interests of the Jewish student population, he added.

Typically, Hillels now have more and better trained staff, Rubin said.

He lauded Toronto's "supportive foundation, talented staff and great students [some of whom he's met at conferences]. They add a lot to the system."

He also mentioned being very interested in JCS' upcoming student arts festival (being held Mar. 7 to 9). To his knowledge, there is nothing similar on as comprehensive a scale.

שישאר בינינו

ישראל, חורף 99:

מערכת הבחירות התחילה בטונים גבוהים ובלתי נעימים. במשך שבוע שהייתי בארץ התרשמתי שהסיכוי של מפלגת העבודה והמרכז (שנוזלת כוחות כנראה בעיקר ממפלגת העבודה) להזיז את נתניהו אינו גדול. נתניהו עולה על ברק ומרדכי בהופעתו בטלביזיה, שזו בעצם כיום זירת הקרב הציבורי האמיתית. יכולתו להגיד חצי אמיתות במשפטים קצרים, מבלי שלצופה תהיה אפשרות לשמוע את כל הנושא- עולה על יכולתם של ברק ומרדכי. עברו הימים שבהם ההכרעות הפוליטיות קרו בכיכרות של ערים ועיירות פיתוח. כיום הכל תלוי ביכולת המועמד להזיז בשטח פעילים נאמנים (ובזה הליכוד עובד מצוין) ולהופיע היטב בטלביזיה (ובזה נתניהו הינו אשף). שני הדברים גם יחד אין להם ולא כלום עם האמת: תהליך השלום הופסק, בישראל יש מיתון כבד והקופה הציבורית נשדדת לאור יום על ידי הדתיים. מבחינתנו, הישראלים של צפון אמריקה, יש למערכת הבחירות הזו סממן חדש: מספר לא מבוטל של ישראלים בעלי יכולת הודיעו שבנינוד לעבר הם יתרמו ויתרימו כדי לנסות להביא לשינוי השלטון. מפלגת המרכז מחזרת אחרי הקהל הזה בגלוי. ליצחק מרדכי, מנהיג מפלגת המרכז, יש חברים בעלי אמצעים באה"ב והוא נסע לפגוש אותם. בהחלט שינוי ניכר מהימים של "נפולת נמושות". אבל שיישאר בינינו.

"אותו הים":

זהו ספר חדש של עמוס עוז, והוא צופן בתוכו הפתעה מרעישה, שאותה אגלה לכם, מפאת חוסר מקום, בעוד שבועיים.

רק כדי להביא חשק, הינה כמה שורות:

"כל שבת מביאים לי את הנכדים, אחת טלה אחד גדי, אחת קוראת לי טָתָה טי, אחד אוהב למרוט אותי. בליל שבת ישנים תמיד איתי משני צדדי במיטתי. אני שומרת על שניהם מחלום רע ומקרה, והם שניהם שומרים אותי מבדידותי וממותי."

אנא כורדי:

מנהיג מחתרת כורדי נתפס על ידי התורכים. הכורדים, שפזורים כמו יהודים בכל העולם, החליטו שהמוסד שותף בלכידתו של אוג'לן והם מתקיפים קונסוליות ישראליות. בברלין הם מצליחים להתגבר על שוטרים גרמניים ולהיכנס עם גרזנים לבניין הקונסוליה. מאבטח ישראלי בוגר סיירת צה"לית, עוצר אותם באקדחו לפני שהם מצליחים לחטוף את האקדח. הוא יורה כעשרים כדורים, ומהדו"ח הפתולוגי עולה שכולם כמעט פגעו במטרתם. עד כאן - סיפור בלתי נמנע של רינונשים עזים ומובנים. אבל הקטע המגעיל בא אחר כך: דוברת המחתרת הכורדית אומרת בהצהרה רשמית: " לא נשכח ולא נסלח על הטבח בברלין". אתם מבינים את זה? הטבח בברלין! לכורדים מותר להיכנס עם גרזנים לשגרירות ישראלית אבל כשמנסים לעצור אותם (בפנים יש אנשי קונסוליה) - זה טבח.

אפרופו המוסד: ראש המוסד הכחיש את השתתפות ישראל. גם אם המוסד השתתף- הוא חייב להכחיש וטוב שעשה כך. כללית - בכלל לא מזיק שכורדים, ערבים ושאר מניפי גרזנים שונאי ישראל יחשבו שהמוסד הישראלי נמצא בכל מקום. הגנה עצמית מתחילה קודם כל במה שהשונאים שלך חושבים שתעשה ואיך הם חושבים שתגיב. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Montreal Jewish school gets $3.4 million bequest

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish Peoples Schools and Peretz Schools (JPPS) recently was the recipient of perhaps the largest bequest ever left at one time to a local Jewish school – $3.4 million.

But delighted school officials have no choice but to stay mum about who left the windfall. They only know it came from an anonymous South American who passed away last year.

"Needless to say, we're delighted," said JPPS executive director Merle Frankel in an interview.

The details surrounding the bequest were as serendipitous as they were sudden.

Frankel told The CJN that in June of last year, , a former JPPS president living in Israel — Danny Kingstone — was visiting Geneva, Switzerland on private business on behalf of a client.

During a meeting with bankers there, he was asked, as a former member of Montreal's Jewish community, whether he had any knowledge of, "a school where Yiddish was taught and where a man named Shloime Wiseman had been principal."

Well, he did indeed, and one month later Frankel, accompanied by JPPS honorary vice-president Sidney Shapiro, were themselves on their way to Switzerland with the school charter in hand as proof for bank executors that JPPS was the school the donor was referring to in his will.

The school received the funds by mid-January.

Just why an anonymous man from South America would decide to leave JPPS a small fortune remains something of a mystery.

But Frankel does recollect that many years ago Wiseman, one of JPPS's most distinguished figures (he co-founded the school and served as principal there for over 50 years), had met a South American in Israel, who engaged him in conversation.

She said that upon his return, Wiseman, who died about a decade ago, told her about this encounter, and "mentioned to me the possibility that the school might get some money some day," but so many years passed that Frankel never really thought about it.

The only word to describe the school's reaction when it got the news was, "shock," she said.

The bequest did come with certain conditions attached.

Frankel said that the funds cannot and were not intended to be used to reduce tuition fees. JPPS's annual operating budget is about $10 million, with average fees of $3,800 at the elementary school level, and $4,500 at the high school level.

Proceeds from the bequest must be used exclusively to establish a foundation in Wiseman's name that will promote four specific goals: the study and use of the Yiddish language and culture; the love and appreciation of Israel; a pluralistic approach to Judaism; and study of the Holocaust.

While those goals, in a sense, have always been within the traditional mandate of JPPS, Frankel said interest from the funds — the capital will remain intact — will allow the school to greatly enhance the Jewish portion of its curriculum through innovative and experimental programs.

"We'll be able to try new things," she said. "It will make the school a more interesting, exciting place."

A committee has been struck so that proceeds from the new bequest can be used as expeditiously and as judiciously as possible, she said.

"This new fund will enable us to bring new and exciting learning experiences to our students," JPPS president Lawrence Rudner said.

Ottawa Israelis celebrate

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — You can take the Israelis out of Israel, but you just can't take Israel out of the Israelis. That was the consensus of more than 300 Israelis, friends and relatives who got together to enjoy An Israeli Happening, held recently at Agudath Israel Congregation.

The event was co-sponsored by the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (JCC), the Embassy of Israel and the Israel Experience Centre.

Hagit Goldfarb, the Israeli shlichah, was thrilled with the turnout. "The goal of the evening was to get Israelis together. Many don't come out to other activities in the Jewish community. For the non-Israelis, the evening was intended as a sample of Israeli culture, through its music, dance and food."

The music of Shimon Peer of New York, kept the crowd dancing horas and other modern Israeli folk dances for hours, stopping only for trips to the buffet table.

Chen Ivri, consul at the Embassy of Israel, brought greetings on behalf of Israeli ambassador David Sultan who was unable to attend. The aliyah shaliach for the region, Benzion Sela, travelled from Montreal to address the crowd.

Phyllis Leith, one of the event's organizers, called it "a wonderful gathering of two communities, the Israelis and Canadians, in an atmosphere of celebration."

Ontario Tory poll angers Thornhill residents

been dealt with."

In a written statement, Molinari said she was "appalled that such questions would be asked on any survey, and I am embarrassed that I would be associated with such activities." She said she was "not aware that any of these questions were being asked on any survey, and was very disappointed to learn of them."

She said she has instructed her campaign not to receive the results of the survey, "as I do not wish to have any part of it."

She also apologized to CJC and to any individuals hurt by the questions.

Ronen, for his part, said the whole episode was "an insult to the Jewish community.

"Tomorrow, it could be the Sikh community."

He said he doesn't believe the poll was commissioned without someone in the party having reviewed the questions.

Among those polled was Lisa Naiken, a 32-year-old Thornhill resident who said she was "very uncomfortable" with the questions.

She said the survey began innocently enough, with questions about how voters regard Harris and others.

Then came the two queries about a candidate's Jewish background.

"I asked them for their phone number, but they didn't give it," Naiken told The CJN. "I told them I refuse to answer anymore questions."

Naiken insists that the question she was asked was not whether she would vote for the son of a Holocaust survivor, but whether she would vote for the son of someone who survived Auschwitz.

"I'm absolutely certain of that. I wrote it down." The question left her "feeling awful for a long time."

Ronen's father, Mordechai, is an Auschwitz survivor. Last month, he accompanied Prime Minister Jean Chrétien on a high-profile visit to the former death camp.

Canadian Voter Contact was one of the provincial Tories' main pollsters, and had also provided data to organizers of the recent United Alternative conference, which explored the possible merger of the federal Conservatives and the Reform party.

Mykytyshn was recently described as "the new polling guru of Canada's right wing."

Over the weekend, the CJC received a letter of apology from Mykytyshn. The CJN's calls to Mykytyshn were not returned.

Israel conveys its thanks to Montreal police

26th floor of the CIBC Development Corp. building at 1155 René Lévesque Blvd. W. – was controlled by Montreal Urban Community (MUC) police.

About 100 Kurds, some of whom carried crowbars, projectiles, and Molotov cocktails hidden in baby strollers, tried to storm the building during their protest.

Some broke through the entrance, but were repelled by RCMP officers stationed inside.

Outside, MUC riot police were able to isolate the group in the middle of the street, but one undercover police officer suffered a severe eye injury – he ultimately lost the eye – after a rock was thrown at him, possibly by a teenager.

According to news reports, some protesters also chanted slogans like, "Israel terrorists. Police fascists. Long live Kurdistan."

There were a total of 16 arrests, but all but four were released last week. They have been charged with multiple counts of assault and with rioting.

According to Hassid, consular officials learned of the 11 a.m. protest earlier in the morning, after being contacted by local police.

"Of course it is upsetting," he said. "No one likes to see violence. But Israel has no quarrel with the Kurds. It is part of the world-wide phenomenon taking place."

100 Kurds stormed consulate

Sharon also said in his statement that, "Israel has long-standing friendly relations with the Kurdish people, and has no connection whatsoever in the Ocalan affair.

"Israel will not tolerate harm to its missions or citizens anywhere in the world, and will defend them from terrorism and violence by any means necessary, in coordination with local authorities."

Hassid said that he had no information that Kurds planned any further protests outside the building housing the Israeli consulate.

He said it was contrary to government policy to comment on whether any measures were being put into place to tighten security at the consulate.

Police seek public's help

TORONTO — The Toronto Police Sexual Assault Squad is asking for the assistance of the media and the public with the continuing investigation of Stephen Miles, who has been charged with sexual assault.

Miles is self-employed and operates a company known as Best By Miles Cleaning.

The accused was hired by his victims to clean their residences. While cleaning the victims' homes, it is alleged that he administered a drug that rendered them unconscious and then sexually assaulted the victims.

Anyone who has any information concerning the charges or anyone who may have been in similar circumstances is encouraged to contact Detective Gary Stafford #6031 or Detective Constable Sue Crone #6823 of the Sexual Assault Squad at 808-7474 or Crime Stoppers at 222-TIPS.

Scene in Ottawa

By G. K. SIMCOE

Moguls may be a desirable feature on the ski slopes of Whistler, B.C., but Prime Minister Jean Chrétien had a far bumpier ride than he anticipated when Parliament returned from its most recent recess.

Day after day, Opposition MPs lambasted the prime minister for his failure to attend the funeral of Jordan's King Hussein.

Canadians now know more about flight paths, cruising speeds and Department of National Defence (DND) flight readiness protocols than most Air Force cadets, but they are no wiser about what really prevented the PM from joining more than 40 other heads of government in Jordan to pay their last respects to the Hashemite monarch. As is so often the case, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition missed the real story.

The Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) committed three serious errors, and while the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) and DND chief, General Maurice Baril, have borne the brunt of the initial public outcry, you can be sure that DFAIT officials will be riding a few moguls of their own as this story slips from public view.

First, it appears that officials did not provide the PMO with a clear indication of which foreign leaders were planning to participate in the funeral. In point of fact, Chrétien has a good track record regarding attendance at similar events in the past. Given Canada's warm relationship with Jordan, it is likely that the prime minister was simply not advised of the international political weight that would gather to bid the king farewell.

Second, neither the desk officer in Ottawa nor the Canadian mission in Amman thought to advise the PMO about the scant interval in Muslim tradition between death and burial. The PMO assumed that the state funeral would take place several days after the king's demise, as is the common practice in the west.

Finally, after having lost the opportunity to arrange for Chrétien's presence at the funeral, DFAIT officials at Pearson blew the PM's chance at redemption when they failed to reach out to the Canadian Jordanian community.

The one domestic mandate entrusted to Foreign Affairs concerns the maintenance of contact with Canadian groups with special interests or ties to other countries. Chrétien could have spent one day offering support and comfort to the Jordanian community in, say, Toronto.

Wings are certain to be clipped.

Paul Martin to address Windsor Negev dinner

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

WINDSOR — This year's honoree at the Windsor Jewish National Fund Negev (JNF) Tribute dinner, to be held June 1, is an example of the immigrant's dream come true.

Peter Toldo, a Windsor industrialist and philanthropist, rose from factory worker to owner of a manufacturing empire. He now employs over 1,000 people, most of them in the greater Windsor area.

Born in 1925 in the Veneto region of Italy, Toldo came to Canada in 1934 with his mother and sister to join their father.

He attended school in Windsor, and graduated in machine shop in 1945. His first job was with the Olsonite Company, a manufacturer of bathroom fittings, where he rose to become manager of the company's Windsor and Detroit plants.

In 1964, Toldo started his own bathroom fittings company, Telso, and sold it to Olsonite two years later, but retained responsibility for its management.

He resigned in 1980 and formed Centoco Manufacturing, a tool and die business.

Eventually, his business expanded into enterprises ranging from the design and manufacture of food related products, to executive air charter services and airport design.

Toldo has supported cultural, educational and social organizations and agencies, including the JNF.

Toldo and his wife, Josephine, have a son and daughter, and four grandchildren.

Federal Finance Minister Paul Martin, a personal friend of Toldo, will be the keynote speaker.

The dinner will be co-chaired by lawyer Pat Ducharme and Judge Carl Yalev, tribute chair and past president of Windsor JNF. Past Windsor JNF president William Tepperman, will present the citation.

The public is invited to attend

AMMAN — Israel and Jordan have smoothed over a diplomatic flap.

Tension between the two countries developed as a result of statements questioning the permanence of Jordan's peace with Israel, which were attributed to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

"The prime minister and myself, I think, have clarified the whole thing," Jordan's Prime Minister Fayez al-Tarawneh said at a joint press conference at Basman Palace.

Tarawneh's statement followed two hours of talks between Netanyahu and King Abdullah and various senior Jordanian officials.

Abdullah did not participate in the joint press conference, apparently because he is new in the job. Tarawneh and Netanyahu seemed somewhat stiff at the conference, which was overshadowed by reports about the deaths of four Israelis who were killed in Lebanon.

In terms of his impression of the new Jordanian king, Netanyahu said: "I was very much impressed with his leadership and with the fact that he is continuing very clearly the policies of the late King Hussein, the policies of peace and stability," he said.

"I think he is a wise leader, an able leader of a stable country, and one that has stable, strong, durable relations with Israel."

Asked if other Israeli prime ministerial candidates would be welcome in Jordan, Tarawneh said that his country would not initiate contact, but that officials are welcome.

Sunday's gathering began with Netanyahu and Abdullah meeting privately. They were later joined by Sharon and Tarawneh. Afterward senior officials from both sides joined in for lunch.

Given the transition in Jordan, there was considerable interest on the Israeli side as to who the Jordanian participants would be. Prince Hassan, who was present at every high-level talk with Israel since the 1994 peace treaty, was not in attendance.

Regarding general bilateral issues, Netanyahu said he believed that Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon would be effective "in cutting through the bureaucracy" and resolving issues related to trade. Tarawneh promised to give Sharon a list of Jordanian trade complaints.

Netanyahu said there would be talks "in a matter of days" to promote trade.

Bilateral trade is at a modest level of $42 million.

Israel's exports to the territories are a different matter. They amount to $1.8 billion, while Jordan with $22 million in exports, has about one percent of that sum.

When Jordan complained about the limits Israel places on its exports to the West Bank, Israeli participants explained that the Palestinian Authority (PA) is responsible for restrictions on Jordanian goods.

According to Israeli representatives, Jordan asked that its bilateral projects with Israel not be subject to the freeze in Israeli-Palestinian relations.

When Jordan complained about water shortages, Sharon said that he was almost ready to ask the European Union (EU) for $500 million in assistance for joint projects. Until now, the EU has required that Israel, Jordan and the PA first develop joint plans for water usage.

Jordan also asked Israel, as a "gesture," to release 40 Palestinian security prisoners who have Jordanian citizenship. When Sharon noted that Israel would not release prisoners who are accomplices to murder, Tarawneh said he is not asking that those individuals be released.

A few months ago, Jordan asked that doctors be allowed to visit its prisoners in Israeli jails. Sharon agreed to the request, but the Jordanian doctors union later said it was boycotting Israel.

Sharon said that Israel would not accept an alternative proposal of allowing PA doctors to visit prisoners with Jordanian passports.

PA slams Israel for closing territories

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority (PA)Planning Minister Nabil Sha'ath Sunday criticized Israel's decision to impose a full closure on the territories, calling it "an aggressive and unjust action that constitutes a violation of the peace process."

He also said Israel has never arrested a Palestinian with a valid work permit on suspicion of attempted terrorist activity – meaning that the closure "punishes the innocent" by keeping permit-holders home from work.

According to Shlomo Dror, the coordinator of government activities in the territories, about 100,000 Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip – out of a total population of approximately 2.5 million Palestinians – are allowed to enter Israel under routine, non-hermetic closures.

He added that Israel had decided not to use the "continuous employment" program it has used in the past, which grants permit holders immunity from closures.

He said the program was not needed because the closure was expected to remain in effect only through the end of Purim.

British spy named as Righteous Gentile

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem has given the title of Righteous Among Nations to a wartime British spy who helped save at least 10,000 Jews.

The call to recognize Frank Foley posthumously was made by Britain's Holocaust Educational Trust after the publication of a book, Foley: the Spy Who Saved 10,000 Jews, about his exploits, which included hiding Jews hunted by the Gestapo, helping people find false passports and even visiting concentration camps to rescue other Nazi victims.

Foley, a senior British intelligence officer in Germany in the years leading up to World War II, was head of the British Passport Office in Berlin.

Foley did not have diplomatic immunity and could have been arrested at any time for his activity, much of which was conducted without authorization from his superiors back home.

A Yad Vashem official said Foley's efforts had been known for years, but he could not be officially recognized because the museum had no eyewitness accounts of his actions.

British Jewish leader Lord Janner, chair of the Holocaust Educational Trust, welcomed the decision.

Foley's niece, Patricia Dunstan, said the family was very proud: "I think it is absolutely marvelous that he has been given the award. He certainly deserved it."

Israeli general killed in Hezbollah ambush

At the press conference, Defence Minister Moshe Arens pointed out that two Katyushas hit moshav Margaliyyot overnight, a clear sign of Hezbollah violations of the Grapes of Wrath agreements, which Arens had sharply criticized in media interviews over the weekend.

Northern Command chief Maj.-Gen. Gaby Ashkenazi said that in last week's ambush of the paratroopers reconnaissance unit in which three officers were killed, as well as in Sunday's land mine, he saw "a clear case of escalation that requires response."

The question that arose immediately after the explosion was: Did the Hezbollah have advance knowledge about the movement of the convoy and the identity of the people who were riding in it?

Hezbollah, addressing the matter in television broadcasts Sunday, claimed the answer was yes on both counts.

Officials at the IDF Northern Command admitted that they were deeply concerned about the question, but said it was impossible to answer it unequivocally at this stage. Hezbollah is known to have collected considerable information about the movement of IDF forces in the security zone.

The number of routes through the area – especially for vehicles – is limited. The locations of the IDF and South Lebanon Army (SLA) outposts are well known to the guerrilla organizations. Travel is always done in convoys, which are relatively easy to spot, though the convoy hit yesterday included civilian Mercedes vehicles that stand out less than military ones.

Brig. Gen. Erez Gerstein

Most of the roads at the edge of the security zone are under Hezbollah surveillance. Perhaps the most significant factor of all is that the IDF and SLA know that many of the residents of the security zone cooperate with Hezbollah and pass on information about military activities.

Meanwhile, in Washington, U.S. spokespersons Sunday urged Israel, Lebanon and Syria to show maximum restraint.

National Security Council spokesperson, P.J. Crowley, said the United States was concerned about the increase in armed conflicts between Hezbollah guerrillas and Israeli troops.

"We have communicated today to the governments of Israel, Lebanon and Syria our concern over this increased activity in southern Lebanon," Crowley said.

In Tel Aviv Sunday night, sources said Arens had been in touch with the United States to report on both the land mine incident and Israel's response.

The events highlighted growing opposition to Israel's presence in south Lebanon. Labor MK Yossi Beilin pointed out that in less than three years, more IDF soldiers had been killed in Lebanon than in all the previous years since Israel began withdrawing from Lebanon in 1986.

Arens asked the United States to ask Syria to restrain Hezbollah attacks against northern Israel or there will be an escalation in hostilities, government sources said. The sources say Arens did not spell out what sort of escalation might occur, but in weekend interviews, Arens suggested that Israel could hurt Syrian interests in Lebanon if that's what it would take to end Damascus' support for Hezbollah.

Israel Election Notebook

May 17

• Moderate members of the National Religious Party (NRP) fared well in the primary to determine the party's list of candidates in the May elections for the Knesset. Knesset Member Hanan Porat, considered a leading party hawk, placed 11th and is not expected to win a Knesset seat.

The leader of the list is still Education Minister Yitzhak Levy, followed by Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom.

The NRP is expected to ask its supporters to vote for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the election for prime minister.

Later in the week, some NRP members sought to have Porat elevated to a realistically attainable spot on the party list.

Porat seemed to reject the idea. He is also considering offers from other right-wing parties.

• The Labor party was reported to be close to completion of its "One Israel" slate of candidates. The list is said to include David Levy's Gesher party and the moderately religious Meimad movement.

Still to be resolved was the controversy over Shlomo Lahiani, a Bat Yam businessmen who established the party, Dor Hadash (New Generation), earlier in the week and who would like Labor to give him a safe seat on its list. He and his supporters say they would bring Labor 5,000 votes at least.

• Yisrael b'Aliyah leader Natan Sharansky introduced his party's list to the media. Sharansky hopes to win 15 seats in the upcoming election. The party won six seats in 1996.

$11.5 billion more is a real shot in the arm for our healthcare system.

Healthcare is Canadians' most cherished program. That's why over the next five years, we're committing an additional $11.5 billion to healthcare.

This investment will provide the provincial and territorial governments with substantially more money to deal with critical healthcare concerns, such as emergency room delays and waiting lists for surgery. At the same time, we're investing $1.4 billion into other health priorities like prevention and research for new treatments and cures.

Canadians deserve a healthcare system they can depend on. We know there's still a lot of work to do, but we're committed to getting the job done, no matter what it takes.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 22

• Three army officers were killed and five soldiers were wounded when Hezbollah gunmen ambushed their patrol in southern Lebanon. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called the deaths a "very, very bitter blow" to Israel. He demanded that Syria put an end to the Hezbollah attacks.

Feb. 23

• The Knesset legalized a pirate radio station operated by right-wing settlers. The station, Arutz 7, has broadcast from a ship off Israel's coast for the past 10 years. The station had been investigated by the police and was found to have been broadcasting illegally from within the country.

Feb. 24

• The Jerusalem religious council failed to meet for a third consecutive time, after the High Court of Justice ordered it to convene with Conservative and Reform representatives. The council's haredi members have been boycotting the meetings, prompting the council's head to cancel the sessions because of a lack of quorum.

Feb. 25

• The Supreme Court ruled that an 18-year-old Maryland youth could not be extradited to the United States to face murder charges. Samuel Sheinbaum will be tried in Israel instead. The case appears to have strained relations between the United States and Israel.

• Police prevented Peace Now activists from demonstrating at the grave of Baruch Goldstein on the fifth anniversary of the day he killed 29 Palestinian worshippers in Hebron.

Feb. 26

• IDF soldiers killed three Hezbollah gunmen in south Lebanon.

• Netanyahu told students at Bar-Ilan University that "any solution to Lebanon must go through Syria. There are various different ways to achieve this, either using a deterrence profile, or through diplomatic negotiations, or by a combination of several factors and means that will enable us to leave Lebanon."

Election too close to call

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The forthcoming Israeli general election is too close to call, primarily because the new centre party, led by Yitzhak Mordechai, the former defence minister and the first Sephardi candidate for prime minister, is the wild card in the deck.

Mordechai and his chief allies, Dan Meridor, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak and Roni Milo, may win more Knesset seats than is generally expected and thus score a stunning coup in the May 17 election. If the centre party is as successful as Yigael Yadin's Democratic Movement for Change was in the 1977 election, it might well end up holding the balance of power and determining the shape of Israel's next government.

Benjamin Netanyahu, the incumbent prime minister, has derisively described the centre party as "a passing phenomenon." He may be right. The Democratic Movement for Change, which had 15 seats, proved to be a great disappointment and eventually disappeared from the scene.

Netanyahu, however, should be worried by the emergence of a reconstituted centre party. Virtually all its leading personalities have been personally burned by Netanyahu, and now seek vengeance.

"Our purpose is to overthrow the government of Benjamin Netanyahu," declared Milo, the former mayor of Tel Aviv. As for Mordechai, he reportedly told associates that he will "overturn every stone" to defeat Netanyahu, who unceremoniously fired him.

In this grudge match, Netanyahu is clearly vulnerable. He has broken with powerful colleagues – from Meridor, who was forced out of the cabinet, to Benny Begin, who resigned as science minister to protest the 1997 Hebron accord. And Netanyahu has alienated a significant proportion of his constituents in the Orthodox, Sephardi and Russian communities.

Netanyahu labors under two distinct disadvantages. First, he has a reputation as a divisive, arrogant, double-dealing schemer who is simply untrustworthy. Second, he must contend with the perception, all too common among his followers and his coalition partners, that he is either too eager or too unwilling to relinquish territory in the West Bank to the Palestinians.

In trying to keep critics at both ends of the ideological spectrum at bay, Netanyahu – who has given the Oslo peace process merely grudging support – usually steered a middle course. By doing so, he antagonized many of his backers. Last October's Wye Memorandum was probably his downfall.

At one point, shortly after the dissolution of his government in December, four rivals seemed poised to run against him: Ehud Olmert, the mayor of Jerusalem; Limor Livnat, the communications minister; Ariel Sharon, the foreign minister; and Uzi Landau, chair of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee.

For various reasons, they left the field open to Netanyahu's disillusioned mentor, Moshe Arens. But after Arens was trounced by Netanyahu in the Likud primary, he meekly joined his government as defence minister, a position he had twice previously held.

With 2½ months remaining until Israelis go to the polls, Netanyahu, his bluster notwithstanding, is running scared. In almost every poll, he trails behind Ehud Barak, the Labor party leader, and Mordechai. In all probability, he will be a one-term premier.

In his bid to unseat Netanyahu, Barak, the ex-chief of staff, has appealed to the grievances of Sephardis and Russians, the majority of whom voted for the Likud, among other parties, in 1996. Barak, therefore, has gone out of his way to address issues – the economy and immigrant absorption – dear to the hearts of the Sephardi and Russian electorate.

Nevertheless, the chances are good that the centre party will siphon away a significant number of votes, not only from Labor but from Likud. In the last election, which Netanyahu won by the skin of his teeth, Labor and Likud captured 34 and 32 seats, respectively.

They may not be as lucky come May.

Sharansky looks back on his past

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Natan Sharansky got a rare chance last week to review 20-year-old KGB documents relating to his activities on behalf of Russian Jewry.

Heading a trade delegation on a two-day trip to Moscow, Sharansky, Israel's minister of industry and trade, met with Vladimir Putin, head of the Federal Security Service, the successor to the Soviet-era KGB.

During that meeting, Putin showed Sharansky his KGB dossier – some 52 volumes of documents – including papers relating to his arrest and conviction in 1977 on charges of spying for the United States.

Putin gave some of the documents to Sharansky, who spent nine years in Soviet prisons as a result of his campaign for Jewish emigration rights in the Soviet Union during the 1970s.

Sharansky later said he was impressed to see all the piles of documents – and the one piece of paper certifying that he was "rehabilitated" less than a decade ago, under then-Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev.

Two years ago, during his first trip to Russia as a member of the Israeli cabinet, Sharansky was denied access to the KGB documents.

Sharansky said the documents contained "so much grudge, so much bitterness."

But just the same, he found reason for optimism in the fact that this page of his personal history – and that of his native land – now belonged to the past.

"Where today are all those investigators? Where is the KGB?" he asked in a television interview.

Seeing just what KGB had on him

This was Sharansky's third visit to Moscow since 1997, when he visited the Lefortovo Prison where he had spent 18 months in isolation.

The official part of his latest visit focused on three issues: economic cooperation between Israel and Russia, Russia's nuclear assistance to Iran, and the recent growth of Russian anti-Semitism.

In a meeting with Putin, Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov and Interior Minister Sergei Stepashin, Sharansky discussed Israeli concerns about the physical safety of the Russian Jewish community.

Sharansky asked them whether they believed that recent anti-Semitic statements by members of the Russian Parliament could lead to pogroms.

"They agreed that such a danger exists, at least purely theoretically," Sharansky said later, adding that his Russian hosts had assured him that they were closely monitoring the situation.

In another meeting about Russia's nuclear cooperation with Iran, Sharansky suggested that Israel and the West should attempt to get Russian scientists involved in international research projects so that Russian strategic interests would follow those of the West instead of Iran.

Last week, Sharansky was greeted by some 500 members of the Moscow Jewish community, who packed the Moscow House of Cinema to see the former Prisoner of Zion.

Years after his release from a Soviet gulag, many in the audience still viewed Sharansky as a hero.

"He was among those people who made democracy in this country possible," Sima Landau, a retired librarian, said, echoing the view of many here.

'Crazy and wonderful things happen at Purim'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For most Jews, Purim is one of their favorite holidays. Who doesn't enjoy having the chance to make lots of noise in shul, dress up in costumes and eat all those yummy hamantaschen?

A lot of kids get together with their friends and their sisters and brothers and put on plays that tell the story of Purim. They have great fun pretending to be the beautiful Esther, brave Mordecai, and especially the evil Haman. My children used to like to be Vashti and paint spots all over their faces.

In Purim Play, Frannie, her brother Ezra and their two cousins always put on a play during their family Purim party. But one Purim, we learn in the book by Roni Schotter, illustrated by Marylin Hafner (Little, Brown, 1998), the cousins have the flu and can't come.

Ezra's friend David will help out, provided he can play Achashverosh, and Ezra will play Mordecai. Frannie, of course, is Esther, but who will play Haman?

As if that isn't bad enough, their mother tells them that she has invited Mrs. Teplitsky, an elderly widow who lives up the street, to come to the party and suggests that she play Haman.

Frannie and Ezra are very upset. Not only is Mrs. Teplitsky a grown-up (and an old one), but she is a woman. How can she possibly play Haman?

Well, as Papa says, "Who can tell? Crazy and wonderful things happen, especially at Purim."

Mrs. Teplitsky, you see, used to be an actress, and she makes a really scary Haman. It turns out she can also be a friend to Frannie, who has been feeling lonely.

You really feel the excitement of a Purim party, and can almost taste Mama's famous "bet-you-can't-eat-just-one" apricot-orange hamantaschen.

PURIM (POO-rim)
WHO CAN TELL ME ABOUT PURIM?
PURIM IS YET ANOTHER CELEBRATION OF OUR FREEDOM. HAMAN WAS THE WICKED MINISTER OF KING AHASUERUS OF PERSIA. HE PERSUADED THE KING TO KILL ALL THE JEWS BECAUSE A JEW NAMED MORDECHAI WOULDN'T BOW TO HIM. QUEEN ESTHER TELLS THE KING THAT HAMAN, NOT MORDECHAI IS THE ENEMY AND THE JEWS WERE SAVED.
THE STORY OF PURIM, CALLED THE MEGILLAH, IS READ ON THE EVE OF PURIM.
WHENEVER HAMAN'S NAME IS CALLED OUT, PEOPLE STAMP THEIR FEET AND USE GROGGERS.
BOO, HAMAN!

Cancellation of popular radio show doesn't mean the end for duo

By JOSEPH SERGE
Business Editor

TORONTO — Their popular radio show may have just been cancelled, but you won't find Marty and Avrum crying in their soup.

In fact, they're about to launch their own soup line to go along with their Marty and Avrum Eat Here line of pretzels and ice cream.

Hosts of the popular Sunday morning food show on Talk 640 since September 1995, Marty Galin and Avrum Rosensweig recently were the first let go when new management and a change of format took over the station.

"That's not unusual in radio," Rosensweig said. "Somebody once told us, 'you're not anybody unless you get fired a couple of times.' It was very hard for us because we did such a good job with it."

"The show was very popular," Galin said. "We always had sponsors and we literally brought in $350,000 in business to the station." The worst part for them, Galin said, was the suddeness and the lack of closure. "We appreciate all the calls we got. We never had a chance to say goodbye."

But Marty and Avrum aren't going anywhere yet. They're currently negotiating with a major television network to have a show similar to their radio program on TV across the country this fall, and plans are also underway to launch a syndicated radio show in the United States. All part of Marty and Avrum's plans to make their names – and their food lines – a household name.

What began last year with a line of fresh-baked kosher pretzels, has since developed into their own line of Metropolitan ice cream sorbet, and by this spring expect to see Marty & Avrum Eat Here soups and cheese cakes.

They insist that cancelling their radio show won't get in the way of their plans for global domination.

"Our products have taken on a life of their own," Galin said. "We're having meetings for U.S. distribution, and participating in the Fine Food Show this April."

All their food products, currently only available in Ontario, are kosher.

"We're both Jewish," Galin said, "and I know there's a niche out there for kosher food. Plus a lot of my friends are Orthodox and we wanted them to be able to taste our products."

It's also a great marketing strategy. "Kosher is very hot and growing all the time," Rosensweig said. "There's a perception [among non-Jews] that Kosher is healthier and cleaner. Also, the kosher market has become very creative."

Together with Metropolitan, they are now launching their line of Metropolitan kosher for Passover sorbet.

"Metropolitan appreciates the Jewish business our ice cream gets, and wants to give back to the community," Galin said. "We're coming out with a kosher for Passover line of banana sorbet and strawberry kiwi orange. You get a litre for the price of half a litre."

Marty Galin (left) and Avrum Rosensweig are set to launch their kosher for Passover Metropolitan ice cream sorbet.

After the success of their pretzels, Metropolitan Ice Cream which has been producing all natural ice creams since 1984, was interested in co-labelling an ice cream with the duo. The two developed a fruity sorbet they called Tropical Passion. "They say it's one of their best sellers," Galin said. "We're now developing Chocolate Sunrise – a chocolate, tangerine flavor." Metropolitan is under the COR certification.

The soups they're working on with a local restaurateur are a "hybrid of Jewish and Italian recipes," Rosensweig said. "They're very tasty."

They will include a hot and sour chicken base soup, a vegetarian curry soup, a bean and vegetable soup and a sweet potato soup. The cheesecakes currently in development are black forest, blueberry and plain. They're also planning a kosher snack food.

"We will never do a product we don't like," Galin said. "When you put your name to something, you have a responsibility to your buyers."

Always a part of the Jewish community here – Rosensweig, a former fundraiser for the United Jewish Appeal, founded Ve'Ahavta, a locally based charity that amongst other things, organizes a Jewish Mobile Response team for the homeless – the duo recently helped raise $10,000 for the kids charity Toronto Breakfast Club. "A percentage of our soup sales will go to the breakfast club. We also want to find a product where all the receipts will go back to the community."

Fans can rest assured their new television show will carry on the same format of their radio show: witty banter combined with serious talk about their favorite subject – food.

Over the past three years they've done a live Passover seder, a native Pow Wow, and hosted an engagement and a wedding.

"We actually brought in a priest and did the whole ceremony in the lobby of the radio station," Rosensweig said.

For five years, Century hung out with members of the Franklin Avenue Posse, an African-American rap group and street gang.

"Call it voyeurism – compulsion, lunacy – but something was driving me forward, forcing me to see it with my own eyes," he writes of his intense desire to explore this underground culture.

Century's first book received a good review in the Forward. Reviewer Janice Eidus called it compelling, riveting and fascinating. (Warner, $25 US.)

Knowledge helps you make sound investment decisions, women told

CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In one of every three households in North America today, women are taking control of investment decisions, says Miranda Koffski, the national sales manager for the Women in the Know program of TD Asset Management, a wholly-owned subsidiary of TD Bank.

Speaking at a financial seminar sponsored by the New Leadership Division and Women's Division, State of Israel Bonds, Koffski explained that the reasons TD created the Women in the Know program included the recognition that women live longer than men, that women have not reached wage parity, and that few women have an adequate company pension.

She stressed the importance of educating oneself on investing. Professional investment managers can take care of the details, but individuals must have the knowledge to make confident decisions on where to invest their money.

The three stages of investing are: setting your objectives and lifestyle goals, planning your strategies, and implementing and monitoring your program, she said.

She recommended diversification, because, she said, it is difficult to know "where exactly we are in the business cycle" and to pick investments accordingly.

Koffski stressed the importance of preparing a will, reviewing disability and other insurance needs, and being familiar with inheritance laws.

Shelley Nesbitt, an investment advisor with Nesbitt Burns and a member of the board of State of Israel Bonds, discussed the advantages of purchasing Israel Bonds.

She cited the high Standard & Poors rating of State of Israel Bonds, "and Israel's unblemished record of repayment."

She said Bonds can be purchased with RRSP funds or by making a contribution to one's RRSP with an existing Bond.

Dodi Weill, vice-chair of North America State of Israel Bonds announced that through the efforts of Larry Waller, executive vice-president of Canadian Israel Securities, in March Israel Bonds will be launching a $136 (Cdn) Chai Certificate, which matures for $180 in five years and is issued in Canadian currency.

"This new product is a perfect gift and a perfect way to bond the next generation to the State of Israel," said Weill.

The Governess and Passover Fever now on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The past few months have seen a virtual flood of Jewish films being released on video, and that outpouring continues well into March and April.

One film that fits the Jewish definition perfectly is The Governess, which arrived in video stores in early February.

First let me give a short warning. The Governess contains some very explicit sexual scenes and nudity so it may not be to everyone's taste.

But the film does have several redeeming qualities, including a strong performance by Minnie Driver in the feature role. Driver plays Rosina Da Silva, the eldest daughter of a Sephardi family living in London, England in the 1840s.

When Rosina's father is killed and the family is left destitute, she secures a job as a governess to a wealthy family on the remote Isle of Skye. To obtain this position, Rosina changes her name to Mary Blackchurch and takes on a new identity as a devout Christian.

While on the island, Rosina assists the husband in his scientific experiments and eventually begins a torrid affair with him. This eventually forces her to leave the job and return to her family in London.

One of the important points this film makes, espeically at a time when increasing numbers of young Jews are becoming more assimilated, is Rosina's refusal to forsake her traditions and her religion. Within the privacy of her own room, she lights Sabbath candles and even celebrates Passover. At a time of deep personal turmoil, Rosina never strays from her people or her heritage.

The Governess gives Minnie Driver her first opportunity to headline a film. She is backed by an excellent cast including Tom Wilkinson of The Full Monty, Harriet Walter, Jonathan Rhys-Myers and Florence Hoath.

One of the best elements in this film is the hauntingly beautiful score composed by Edward Shearman, using several Ladino melodies as a basis for his music.

Another film scheduled to arrive on video in early March is the Israeli feature, Passover Fever.

Gila Almagor plays Yona, the matriarch of the family, and veteran actor Yossef Shiloah plays her husband Michael. Although everything on the surface seems festive, each member of the family is dealing with his or her own demons.

Casting a pall on the proceedings, is the fact that one son was recently killed in a military accident. Another son, Nathaniel, is trying to get even with his ex-wife for divorcing him and comes with his current girlfriend, although he knows his ex-wife will be present. Another son has an eating disorder, and another son's wife is overweight and very sensitive about her appearance.

A granddaughter has refused to speak for two years and a grandson insists it is going to snow – in Israel. It is indeed a strange family, made even stranger by Yona's suspicion that her husband is having an affair. Throughout this turmoil, Yona remains strong and insistent that the family be together for the holiday.

Almagor gives a tremendous performance, fully justifying her reputation as Israel's leading actress, and the rest of the cast is also very strong. If Passover Fever has any shortcomings it is in the script which often stretches credulity to the limit.

Passover Fever is in Hebrew with English subtitles and is being distributed by Mongrel Media. If your favorite video store does not carry this title, they can order a copy from Mongrel at 516-9775.

CORRECTION

In a review of a March 3 TV documentary on Michele Landsberg (Feb. 25), we incorrectly stated that Landsberg's mother is in her 90s. In fact, she passed away some time ago. CJN regrets the error.

A small world after all

By JEFF ROSEN
News Editor

ORLANDO — "It all started with a mouse."

I kept telling myself this during a recent family vacation to ever-popular Walt Disney World in Orlando, Fla.

While this was by no means my first visit to the 28-year-old Florida vacation area, it has undergone numerous changes during my 10-year absence.

Since its opening in October 1971, Walt Disney World Resort has grown into a 30,500-acre entertainment and recreation centre consisting of four theme parks, three water adventure parks, 26 resort hotels, and other varied sports, commercial and recreational facilities.

If you are looking to really escape the rat race and get away from it all, the way to do it is to stay right at Disney World.

Walt Disney World offers a broad range of accommodations designed for every lifestyle and price range. By staying there, you can take full advantage of the resort's complimentary transportation system of monorail trains, motor coaches and boats, which connect virtually all areas of the vacation resort.

Staying on-site also allows guests to get an early morning head start to the theme parks on selected days.

Just be sure that all the facilities outlined in your travel brochure are up and fully functional before leaving home. The Yacht and Beach Club Resort, which boasts a 1.2 hectares mini-waterpark with water slide and whirlpool, is currently beachless and without its main pool area due to renovations. It will remain closed until approximately March 29.

Whether you choose to stay at Disney World or in the surrounding Orlando area, be sure to start early to avoid the always present line-ups and crowds.

Of the four theme parks – Magic Kingdom, Epcot, Disney-MGM and Animal Kingdom – the Magic Kingdom is the one most people associate with Walt Disney World. At one time its very name was synonymous with Disney World.

While this no longer holds true, the "magic" of Magic Kingdom remains, whether you are on your first visit or returning to see what has changed. It remains the largest of the four theme parks, consisting of 40 major attractions in seven theme lands on a 107-acre site.

Be prepared for a long day-visit here. However, to take in the time-less and varied new attractions, it is easier to just relax, slow down and return for a second day visit. This is especially true if you are travelling with children who want to explore every nook and cranny and visit every souvenir shop available.

Just a short hop away (actually a boat or bus ride for resort guests), Disney's "adopted child," MGM Studios, offers visitors a peek into the world of movie and TV magic.

Here you can go behind-the-scenes to see how they made popular movies such as Armageddon and 101 Dalmations, take a backlot tour, or "take the ride of your life" on The Twilight Zone Tower of Terror or Star Tours which takes participants on an intergalactic voyage with R2D2 and C3P0 from the Star Wars universe.

If it's shows that you enjoy, then Disney-MGM Studios has your ticket, including the Indiana Jones Epic Stunt Spectacular, Beauty and the Beast – Live on Stage, Voyage of the Little Mermaid and, the newest of them all, Fantasmic, a spectacular featuring lights, lasers, fireworks and water animation.

This show takes you inside the dreams of Mickey Mouse – where his magic creates dancing waters, shooting comets, animated fountains, swirling stars, balls of fire and other wonders.

It takes place nightly at a newly constructed 6,500-seat amphitheater, which also has standing room for 2,500.

Despite its size though, guests are advised to arrive at least one hour before show time, as lineups start early and patrons are often turned away from the packed stadium.

Disney's Animal Kingdom may be the "baby" of the theme parks, but there is nothing small about it.

The Animal Kingdom sprawls across 500 acres which have been reconfigured into green jungles, forests and a vast savannah designed to resemble the animal reserves of Africa and Asia.

On Kilimanjario Safaris, passengers experience an African safari in vehicles that bounce over rutted roads, travel through swamps and pass herds of zebra, giraffe, gazelle, elephants and other animals.

More than just a show, Disney has taken great care to get the details right and to stress the importance of ecological conservation.

Afterwards, you can board a steam train to see how the park cares for its real animals.

Traditional Disney has not been abandoned though at The Animal Kingdom. There a couple of animatronic and musical shows available, as well as some wilder rides.

This month, Animal Kingdom will open two new attractions in its new Asia theme area.

The Kali River Rapids will offer a white-water rafting adventure, and Maharajah Jungle Trek offers a unique selection of animals, including the Komodo dragons, tigers, gibbons and other creatures.

If two-legged creatures are more your style, then be sure to head downtown – Downtown Disney that is.

This area is unlike any other found around the resort. It revolves around three theme areas. At the Marketplace, Disney's newly remodelled waterside shopping village has more than two dozen shops. At the other end, the West Side takes in the dining and entertainment district, including an all-new production of Cirque du Soleil, a 24-screen AMC theatre, the 100,000-square-foot interactive DisneyQuest and the House of Blues.

Situated between these two areas is Pleasure Island, a six-acre nightclub theme area, featuring seven nightclubs.

Whether big or small, young or old, Walt Disney World does offer something for all ages. I guess that's the real magic of the place; that despite its size, it really is a small world (after all).

Business Profile

Advisers help small businesses achieve success

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The small business sector represents the largest creator of new jobs, and is perhaps the fastest growing segment of the economy. It is often in these businesses that entrepreneurs create and develop new products and services for today's economy.

However, the small and medium-sized business sector also has a high failure rate.

One Statistics Canada study found that 80 percent of start-ups in the early 1980s did not make it to their 10th anniversary.

In an effort to address this high failure rate and to service the small business sector, consultants have emerged to provide guidance and advice to the sometimes rudderless small business owner.

This is the mandate of VenturEdge Corporation, a Toronto-based team of international business advisers that works in alliance with the chartered accountant firm of Prenick, Langer LLP. Management at the corporation has a total of 100 years of business experience.

VenturEdge which also has offices in New York and Florida, has assembled a team to provide small and medium-size businesses with the key management tools for success.

"We've taken the knowledge that was available to multi-national firms, used the criteria and benchmarks, and brought them down to the level of the small and medium-sized business," said partner Gerald Prenick.

The cornerstone of VenturEdge's approach is a classroom-style program for business owners. Each participant works in a group to design a corporate and personal objectives map.

"We run them through a school and we teach them. They haven't got the time, patience or money to be harangued for a long period of time. So we've created this model that we can deliver in a three- to five-day period. We've taken what's taught at the Harvard Business School and condensed it into modules," said Prenick.

The syllabus of objective mapping guides business owners through the following four questions: Where do you want to be in five years? What are the obstacles that stand in the way of achieving your objectives? What are the tasks to be carried out to overcome the obstacles? What resources are required to execute the tasks?

The sessions are given on a semi-monthly basis to five or six non-competing clients. The course fee is $1,500. A company may send more than one representative for the same course fee, which also includes a work book and coaching.

Building on the objectives map, businesses can be advised in such areas as strategic and tactical business planning, operations management, financial reorganization, international product sourcing, information technology management, quality assurance, organizational structuring and human resource management.

The principals of the company have been working out of the Sheppard Centre at Yonge and Sheppard for over 22 years. Recently, the firm expanded from the 18 staff members it had in 1998, to 22 members. It is expected that by the end of 2000, there will be 25 to 26 staff members at VenturEdge and Prenick, Langer.

The accountancy end of the business produces 1,400 personal tax returns per year. For companies looking for high levels of expertise, five VenturEdge staff members will soon acquire a Certified Management Consultant (CMC) designation, bringing to seven staff who will have this skill level.

"We have been accountants to small and medium-sized businesses since 1957."

The information has been passed down to the second and perhaps third generation owners, he said.

"We have been given this opportunity to get into the consulting field. We probably have the highest percentage of CMCs in the country for our total firm size," said Prenick.

The aligned firms have spent close to $40,000 in the past year on professional development. The objective is to enhance and re-educate the consulting team with what is current, deal with what is current, and deal with technology and professional training.

Partners and staff are asked to speak at events run by organizations such as the North York Chamber of Commerce. Recently, one of the partners spoke to a group of high school teachers about the accountancy profession, at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

By combining the CMC expertise with the financial expertise of an accountancy firm, business owners are given the opportunity to obtain total business management solutions.

"Often, small businesses fail because [the owners are poor] cash managers, not because they can't do sales and marketing. So what we do, is help them learn the tools to effectively manage their business.

"[Often], a small business owner won't have the time to manage, so what we do is create the tools and reports that are necessary. We can look at his business at a glance and see where he's at," said partner Harvey Taraday.

The firm has guided owners to meet these challenges by providing advice on revitalizing the organization, generating opportunities, launching new ventures and expanding into new markets.

VenturEdge is working to promote business, through referral from the chartered banks. The feedback from Toronto Dominion Bank, which recently heard a presentation from VenturEdge, appeared to indicate that the management was on the right track.

"They were very pleased. They put us in touch with their risk management team. They were pleased to assist business, and help clients get their loans," said Taraday.

Naturally, not all companies that require advice are growing. Some require expertise to restructure, and then they become a going concern. VenturEdge can play a role in these situations as well.

"In those cases, the banks would frequently send us clients through a receiver or trustee who will determine whether we can put some pulse back into the business. The focus is really passive protection for the bank. We would try to create some management focus and help them manage their business a little better. For example, help them re-organize their financing and give them the tools to help them measure their business a little bit better," said Taraday.

VenturEdge has also worked with companies to obtain various government grants. One example was the recent success in obtaining $225,000 of federal funding for two international expansion projects for a Canadian manufacturing and distribution company. VenturEdge also bids on government contracts to assist in the delivery of various public sector business support programs.

As many business owners are just trying to meet the next payroll, it certainly is a test for management consultants to encourage them to focus.

"We try to help them look beyond the immediate problems and try to help them see the potential. It's so easy to get mired in the day-to-day. Before you know it, 25 years later you are still mired in the day-to-day. You haven't really achieved anything," said Taraday.

March is epilepsy awareness month

TORONTO — March is epilepsy awareness month.

Unlike other common health problems such as asthma or arthritis, epilepsy is a disorder surrounded by stigma, myths and fear. Superstitions about demons – and misinformation about sticking something in the person's mouth during a seizure – persist even today.

With this in mind, the Epilepsy Association, Metro Toronto has launched a new initiative, Ambassadors for Epilepsy, aimed at breaking down the barriers of misunderstanding that surround people with epilepsy.

The initiative utilizes the expertise of a volunteer delegation of ambassadors made up of people with epilepsy, and their families, supporters and health care providers.

Dr. Roberta Bondar – the only Canadian woman to fly in space – who is a medical doctor trained in the field of neurology, is the honorary ambassador for epilepsy.

"Epilepsy is one of the oldest medical conditions known to humankind, a common neurological disorder that affects one in every 100 Canadians.

"I saw a need to become involved in the Ambassadors for Epilepsy program became of the lack of progress in public acceptance of the person with epilepsy. Our goal is to bring epilepsy out from under its social stigma by raising general awareness and understanding."

During March, local delegates sporting Ambassador for Epilepsy buttons will be blanketing the neighborhood with epilepsy awareness posters and information.

The ambassadors' mandate is to improve the public's understanding of epilepsy. Most people don't really know what epilepsy is, or understand how to handle a seizure should they encounter someone having one.

Robin Rowe of the Epilepsy Association of Metro Toronto explains: "Epilepsy is simply the tendency to have recurrent seizures. Anybody can have one seizure under certain extreme circumstances. The person with epilepsy, on the other hand, has an ongoing tendency to have seizures, probably because of a lesion or glitch in their brain's neurological system."

Children and seniors are the most likely to develop epilepsy: children, because their brains are still developing, and seniors, because theirs are often changed by a stroke. Medication can help control the seizures, sometimes eliminating them completely, but there is currently no cure for epilepsy.

"My father recently told me he recalls seeing me having seizures in my crib, so they obviously began very early," says Penny Pelletier, an ambassador. "Apparently my entire body would shake in a violent manner, and at first they didn't know what was causing this."

Her seizures always begin with her aura – a feeling of terror caused by a burst of excessive electricity in the part of her brain that controls her emotions. As the excessive electrical activity spreads throughout her brain, she loses consciousness, her muscles stiffen and breathing almost stops; then her limbs jerk violently for a few minutes. She sometimes injures herself during her seizures.

Contrary to popular opinion, most seizures are not convulsions. Pelletier also experiences another very common type of seizure in which she appears dazed and confused and repeats unusual gestures. "I have a tendency to pick at the sofa or whatever is handy at the moment, and usually gaze off into the distance, often with a silly grin on my face. If someone is talking to me, I don't respond. When I'm having one of these partial seizures, strangers often mistake me for someone who is drunk or on drugs, which is quite demoralizing."

Many parents of young children with seizure disorders, like Steve Lynette, have become ambassadors.

His 8-year-old daughter Jaimie's brief staring spells look like daydreaming but are actually "absence" seizures. When uncontrolled, Jaimie's frequent seizures make learning at school more difficult.

"A child with a seizure disorder needs an understanding community which recognizes, respects and supports them, says Steve Lynette. They deserve to be treated with dignity, not fear."

If you see someone having a seizure:

- Keep Calm. Start to time the seizure.
- Protect the person from injury. Move dangerous objects out of way.
- Do not restrain the person.
- If the person is having convulsions, do not put anything in the person's mouth. Roll the person on their side.
- If a seizure lasts longer than five minutes or repeats, call for medical help.
- After the seizure, gently reassure the person.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My newborn is very fussy and appears uncomfortable. I am considering trying a new formula. What do you recommend?

A. Babies are often fussy; this is in no way unusual and does not necessarily mean that the formula is the culprit. Before you try different formulas, make sure to consult your child's doctor or a dietitian for guidance. New parents are always desperate to find a solution for their crying baby and often turn to formula or bottles as the potential source of the problem. However, this is not necessarily going to help solve the situation.

Q. My 4-week-old baby appears to always be hungry. Should I start giving the baby some cereal? If so, should I add it into the bottle?

A. Giving the baby cereal at that young age is not usually an appropriate solution. Babies have immature digestive systems, and are unable to properly digest infant cereals before three or four months of age. Therefore, giving the cereal is not likely going to help. It can be dangerous to add cereal to bottles without appropriate guidance from a health care provider, as the cereal may clog nipples and prevent the baby from getting anything. Enlarging the holes can cause choking. If you are concerned about your child's eating, talk to your baby's doctor, and follow his or her guidance. All babies are different; some have larger appetites than others.

Calgary police chief receives letter bomb

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Calgary police are drawing no conclusions as to the motivation of the individual who sent a letter-bomb addressed to Police Chief Christine Silverberg.

The letter-bomb was discovered on Feb. 16 by one of Silverberg's support staff, who felt it was suspicious and alerted the bomb squad. The device was removed without incident.

Contained in a 5x8-inch bubble-pack envelope of the type that is commercially available, the device was sent through the mail and "would have caused serious personal injury, or death," had it exploded, reported Inspector Peter Copple of the Criminal Investigation Unit of the Calgary Police Force.

Silverberg, 49, was away on business when the package was discovered. Silverberg, who was the deputy chief of Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police before taking the Calgary post in 1995, is the first female chief of a major Canadian police force. She has been the target of threats in the past and is accompanied by bodyguards at all times.

Following the incident, speculation over the possible motivation of the bomber filled the pages of Calgary's newspapers. Reporters pointed to the fact that Silverberg is a woman and Jewish as possible factors in the attack. Some even linked the incident to a letter-bombing at the Calgary Jewish Centre in April 1996. No arrests have been made in that incident.

But Inspector Copple would not speculate. "We can't be so shortsighted as to say that this or that thing was a motivating factor – we don't know," he said. "Looking at gender or religion is simplistic and irresponsible, as it raises concerns where they may be unnecessary."

Copple said there is no evidence that the letter-bombing was linked to the incident at the Calgary Jewish Centre.

"We haven't dismissed anything as a possibility. We are looking at all sorts of areas. We will look at other incidents here or elsewhere to figure out what's going on."

Copple said this is the first time in Calgary police history that such an incident has occurred, and to his knowledge, "this is the first time a device of this nature was sent to a chief of police in Canada."

However, he added, this attack "goes beyond one person. It is an attack on an institution. There was a real potential that others could have been injured or killed in the postal service or our own staff."

AT THE CHILDREN'S MUSEUM

Young visitors to the My Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (including two cheetahs) with (from left) JNF vice-president Ron Hoffman, JNF Jerusalem emissary Haen Vered and museum director Katya Rudzik celebrated Tu b'Shvat at the museum by holding a seder, singing, dancing and planting this young orange tree. The Children's Museum Passover event is taking place on March 28. Call 636-1880, ext. 390 for information.

IHL's Hymovitz moves closer to NHL goal

By CARY SHUMAN
The Jewish Advocate

RANDOLPH, Mass. — David Hymovitz has been having an excellent third season as a pro hockey player but he reached new heights in his career on Jan. 17.

Hymovitz, a member of the Indianapolis Ice of the International Hockey League (IHL), received the Rising Star award for his play in the I's all-star game in Cincinnati. Hymovitz had two goals and two assists to lead the Eastern Conference all-stars to a 10-7 victory.

The honor, which is given to the most valuable first-time all-star, brought Hymovitz a step closer to his boyhood dream: to play in the NHL.

Should he reach that goal, the 24-year-old Randolph resident and former Boston College captain would join a handful of other Jewish players such as Mathieu Schneider (New York Rangers), Steve Dubinsky (Calgary) and Ronnie Stern (San Jose) at the pinnacle of world hockey competition.

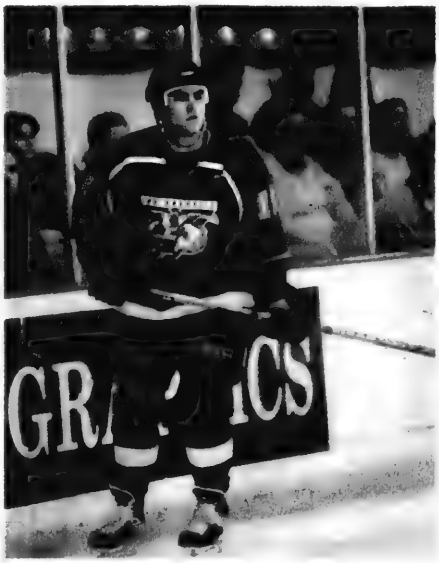
This season, Hymovitz has been attracting the attention of NHL scouts with his prolific scoring talents. A five-foot-11, 185-pound left winger, Hymovitz tallied 24 goals and 21 assists through 42 games.

Developing into the one of the league's top scorers has been especially satisfying for him in view of the fact his progress was limited last year due to ankle surgery. Now at full strength, Hymovitz has become a crowd favorite with his dazzling stickwork, passing and scoring.

Coaches recognized his special skills from the moment he laced up his skates in the Randolph youth hockey program. David's affinity for hockey was hatched when his mother Gail, would bring him to the rink watch his older brothers, Scott and Marc, play hockey.

"David was always a rink rat," Gail recalled. "I remember one of his coaches telling me when he was 5 years old that 'this kid is going to be some kind of hockey player.'"

Even as their son travelled the youth hockey circuit, sometimes playing two or three games in one day, Gail and Allen Hymovitz made sure their son attended Hebrew school and participated in religious programs.



David Hymovitz of the International Hockey League's Indianapolis Ice.

"My parents wanted me to go to Hebrew school and like many kids, I would rather have been playing sports. It was real tough doing both, but I'm so glad I did. I remember one day going to [Temple Beth Am] Hebrew School with my hockey gear on. Religion is a big part of my life," Hymovitz said.

A good student, he attended Thayer Academy where he carved out a spectacular high school career. The Chicago Blackhawks thought enough of Hymovitz's pro potential to select him in the ninth round of the NHL amateur draft.

Heavily recruited at Thayer, Hymovitz chose to attend Boston College (BC) over University of New Hampshire, Boston University and Northeastern. According to the Randolph native, he couldn't have been happier with his academic, athletic and social experience at BC where he became the Jesuit school's first Jewish hockey captain. He also earned Hockey East all-star honors and received a degree in communications.

"I would definitely recommend BC for Jewish students," Hymovitz said. "I received a great education and I experienced no anti-Semitism in my four years there."

Hymovitz said athletic personnel at BC were understanding of his special dietary requirements during road trips. "My teammates would all be eating ham and cheese sandwiches and the trainers would bring me a plain turkey sandwich," he recalled.

Since turning pro, Hymovitz has had to confront some unpleasant jeers from opposing players on the ice. "I've had a few of those throughout my career, but I just shrug it off," he said.

Hymovitz has begun to draw strong support from the Jewish community in the Indianapolis area. "I went to the team's community relations director and I told him I wanted to start speaking to kids at the Jewish Community Centre. As a little kid, I remember looking up to my brothers and their friends. I realize that I can be an inspiration to Jewish kids, especially young athletes."

While he hasn't joined a synagogue in Indiana yet, he does actively follow his Jewish heritage. "I attended synagogue on the High Holy Days and I stay in touch with my Jewish faith on road trips. During Chanukah, I lit the candles. It's tough on weekends because many of our games are on Friday nights and Saturdays but I do what I can and I keep in touch with my family. They instilled strong Jewish traditions and principles in me, and it's important for me to carry those on."

Does the former BC star have immediate goals following his all-star accomplishment?

"I just want to put together a good, solid year and stay consistent, game in and game out for 82 games," he said. "I want to improve every game."

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

מורשת השתיקה

פרופסור בר-און הוא ראש המחלקה למדעי ההתנהגות באוניברסיטת בן-גוריון בנגב וספרו מורשת השתיקה: שיחות עם ילדי הרייך השלישי, חוצאת הספרים של אונברסיטת בן-גוריון בצב, מעניק לנו חיבט פסיכולוגי מורכב וייחודי בחקר תופעת זוועת הנאצים.

עדיין השאלות גדולות מן התשובות.

About families

Dear Susan,

My 19-year-old son reads Playboy and Hustler. He and his friends also watch X-rated movies in our home and in theirs as well. I am at a loss as to how to react. What do you suggest?

Dear Parent,

Young boys often foray into the world of soft porn through Playboy before they have engaged in a satisfying interpersonal relationship. However, young men who remain fixated on these kinds of stimuli beyond their mid-teens may be signalling future psychological problems.

Progressing from soft porn to X-rated movies can indicate a turn for the worse, as these movies often depict women in humiliating, demeaning situations. They often feature sadism and bondage, can include underage girls who are presented as legitimate sexual partners, and can legitimize non-consensual sexual acts.

Boys and men frequently watch these movies in a clandestine fashion, which can have the effect of removing sexual activity from the normal realm. Pornography may act as a catharsis for some; however, for others, it can be symptomatic of, and a causal factor in, a dysfunctional sex life.

I would set a strict rule stipulating zero tolerance for pornography in the house, either in print or video form. You should also be aware that the Internet is a significant source of pornography. Depictions of explicit sexual activity are not only available on the Web, but interactive Web sites can lure the unsuspecting into more invasive and dangerous situations. Check your Internet service provider to determine if your children's Internet access can be censored or monitored. Otherwise, you must determine whether access to the Internet is worth the ultimate risk.

You may want to ascertain how much of your son's time is spent on these activities. If these behaviors are consuming a significant amount of his time and energies, you may want to seek counselling for him. While his apparent interest in pornography may be a harmless and passing diversion, you should be sure it is not signalling sexual dysfunction that could be compromising his ability to engage in a healthy sexual relationship.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practicing for more than 19 years.

Marchi busy in Mideast

JERUSALEM — Canada's International Trade Minister Sergio Marchi recently spent a week in the Middle East with a delegation of Canadian businesspeople.

Marchi visited Israel, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and the Palestinian Authority (PA).

"This mission is to enhance the bilateral and commercial partnership with Israel," Marchi told The CJN. "It is important to recognize that the free trade agreement, CIFTA, signed two years ago, is not only working well, but is also important to Canada, particularly as it represents Canada's first free trade agreement outside of the Americas... It has grown by 30 percent in the two years, and that, I think, by any measure, is significant."

In 1998, he said, two-way trade between Canada and Israel reached a record $650 million.

"CIFTA was started not only to do more trade with a valued friend, but it was a win-win situation. The Israeli economy and the Israeli R and D community are very high on the list

Side by side on bus 15

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

Ride the number 15 bus in Jerusalem, and you might think that all Jews in Israel live in a state of harmony.

Its route starts in the mainly Sephardi Katamonim neighborhood, passes through the middle-to-upper class and mainly Ashkenazi areas of Katamon and Rehavia, through downtown, into the haredi neighborhood of Geula, and finally over to the Orthodox majority neighborhood Har Nof.

Life in Israel

Everyone rides this bus.

But get off the bus, and you cannot help feeling the thick religious tension steering day-to-day life in this holy city. Principles and concepts such as democracy, freedom and justice are hotly debated topics.

Haredim and the rest of society are in a head-to-head conflict.

"The situation was approximately the same even before the creation of the State of Israel. In the days of the British mandate, there were the very same conflicts between Orthodox Jews and secular Jews," Amos Gil, executive director of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), said in a telephone interview.

Haredim, the term used to describe the "ultra"-Orthodox, means, literally, those who tremble before God. They have recently become more of a presence in their protests against, what they feel, is the Supreme Court's anti-religious judicial "tyranny" against them.

Their 250,000-strong rally last month outside Jerusalem's Supreme

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Haggadah Published

VANCOUVER — A new illustrated Haggadah has been published by Lubavitch of British Columbia. The book, the first such volume to be published in Canada, was conceived, designed, printed and bound in Vancouver. The idea for it emerged from a meeting between Rabbi Yitzhak Wineberg of Lubavitch and Michael Seelig, the son of the late Israeli artist Heinz Seelig, who illustrated the story of the exodus from Egypt. Proceeds from the volume's sales will go toward educational and charitable causes. For information, call 604-266-1313.

Belt-Tightening Foreseen

CALGARY — Local agencies that receive United Jewish Appeal dollars have been warned that their monthly allotments may be reduced by three to six percent. The cuts are a result of a $77,000 shortfall in Calgary's annual UJA campaign, representing six percent less than what was expected.

ISRAEL

Court Asked To Reconsider

JERUSALEM — Israel's attorney general has asked the Supreme Court to reconsider its refusal last month to extradite an 18-year-old youth to the United States to face a murder charge. Elyakim Rubinstein argued that the ruling in the case of Samuel Sheinbein went against the spirit of Israel's citizenship law, which he said was intended to avoid prosecutions motivated by anti-Semitism or politics. The teenager, who was living in Maryland when the crime was committed, had sought to avoid extradition by claiming Israeli citizenship through his father, who was born in pre-state Israel and left the country as a child. U.S. officials have expressed disappointment at the decision.

Arab MK Faces Charges

JERUSALEM — An Israeli Arab member of the Knesset is to be charged with incitement to murder for remarks he made about the shooting of a Bedouin youth by an Israeli security official. During a Bedouin protest over the incident, Taleb Alsana called for revenge. He later said his comments were misinterpreted, adding that he is being persecuted because he is an Arab.

WORLD

Violations Cited

WASHINGTON — Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) are responsible for "serious human rights abuses," the U.S. State Department says in its annual human rights report. Israel generally respects human rights, but abuses occur because of "policies and practices in the occupied territories and from its fight against terrorism," the department reported. Two Palestinians died in the custody of the PA, the report said, noting "some improvements in the human rights situations" in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. At the same time, Amnesty International condemned the PA's summary execution of Col. Ahmed Mustafa on Feb. 26, on charges Mustafa raped a 6-year-old boy.

Neo-Nazis To Defy Court

MOSCOW — Russia's leading neo-Nazi group said it will hold its national convention in Moscow despite a court ban on gatherings of the Russian National Unity movement. A Moscow police spokesperson said authorities may resort to "forceful methods" to prevent the April convention, which organizers say will attract 10,000 participants.

Skinhead Group Raided

PRAGUE — Czech police have arrested a dozen leaders of a skinhead organization, seizing magazines, CDs, cassettes and lists of supporters. Czech Jewish leaders welcomed the raid as a sign the government is serious about cracking down on hate crimes.

Neo-Nazis Sentenced

BUDAPEST — Six neo-Nazis were given two-year suspended sentences by a Budapest court after they clashed with Hungarian police last month. Another was given probation, and an eighth member of the group was set free for lack of evidence. Hungarian Jewish leaders criticized the sentences as too mild and called for stricter laws to prevent neo-Nazi gatherings.

Jews Memorialized

ZURICH— City officials unveiled a plaque to commemorate the approximately 150 Jews who were killed here 650 years ago. The flourishing Jewish community of medieval Zurich was extinguished in a pogrom, a city official said at the ceremony. Community members were burned, beaten and murdered after being blamed for the Black Death. Only a handful escaped.

Christian Pilgrims

VATICAN CITY — The director of the Vatican's official travel agency has informed Israel he expects as many as six million Christian pilgrims will come to Israel to celebrate the millennium. But the director of a tour operation in Israel disputed that number, saying he expects less than three million Christian visitors late this year and next. Meantime, Pope John Paul II has accepted an invitation from Yasser Arafat to visit the Palestinian Authority, specifically Bethlehem.

Fez Synagogue Rededicated

FEZ, Morocco — Tens of thousands of Jews once lived in the Old City of this former capital of Imperial Morocco. Now only a handful remain. Most have emigrated to France, Israel or Canada.

But earlier this month, about 200 Jews – Moroccans and visitors – braved a driving rain to sing and dance through the medieval streets here as part of a Torah procession to rededicate a historic synagogue.

The rededication of the Danan synagogue, which is more than 200 years old, is the first recent rehabilitation in the Old City of Fez. The renovation was sponsored by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), which has declared Fez's Old City a historic preservation area. Two or three other synagogues in Fez also are expected to be restored under the UNESCO program.

The Torah procession and rededication was just one of many events held in Morocco to commemorate the rich tradition of the country's Jewish community, which has dwindled to an estimated 5,000, the majority of whom live in the country's capital, Casablanca. Only about 300 live in Fez.

Several days of events accompanied the rededication. The official ceremony was also attended by government representatives.

Ashkenazi Jews face unique cancer risk, Toronto study shows

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A high proportion of Ashkenazi Jews have a unique cancer-related genetic mutation, according to researchers at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

The study says the mutation, which can cause colorectal cancer, is evident in one out of every 15 Jews of Ashkenazi descent.

But that doesn't mean Jews of Ashkenazi origin are necessarily more predisposed than Sephardim or even the general population to getting colorectal cancer, researchers say.

The study also points out that only one in 10 people with the mutation will get the cancer in his or her lifetime.

Using the study's own numbers, some 20,000 Canadian Jews may be carriers of the genetic mutation, and 2,000 of those are expected to develop cancer of the colon or rectum.

The study, conducted by researchers at Mount Sinai's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, was published in the February issue of the American Journal of Human Genetics. It notes that colorectal cancer is the second leading cause of cancer deaths in Canada.

The mutation, called I1307K, seems to be present only in those of Ashkenazi Jewish descent.

"Presumably, other mutations exist in the general population," principal researcher Dr. Mark Redston told The CJN. "But those have not been identified yet." Genetic mutations unique to Sephardi Jews may also exist, Redston added.

He said Ashkenazi Jews present an ideal subject for genetic study because they have remained relatively homogeneous over the centuries.

This type of cancer does not appear to be more prevalent among Ashkenazi Jews than in the general population, Redston said.

The study was conducted using archival material on patients at Mount Sinai over the last 20 years.

The study "confirms a lot of scientists' suspicions: that a large fraction of cancer may be due in part to genetic factors," said Alan Bernstein, director of the Lunenfeld research institute.

Colorectal cancer is caused by polyps in the colon which can become cancerous. Redston said these benign polyps are "fairly common," appearing in 30 percent of the general population. There are no symptoms.

People can live with the polyps for up to 20 years, he said. But their removal "will almost certainly" prevent cancer.

Redston recommends that people with a history of cancer in their family undergo genetic testing.

From the editor's desk

In the name of civility

A small news item on the weekend wire services from Ha'aretz in Israel caught my attention. Its headline was "Radio station owner threatens on air to kill Sarid."

Apparently, Israeli police are investigating Israel Bundak, the proprietor of the pirate radio station "Voice of the East," for having broadcast death threats against MK Yossi Sarid of the Meretz party last Friday.

During the broadcast, and against the background sound of gunfire, Bundak said that he was going to kill Sarid, referring to him as Yousef – an Arab name – instead of Yossi.

Bundak was reported to have justified his threat because Sarid "did not love the religion," but rather "loved the Supreme Court."

One need not be a supporter of Sarid, or of his party's fervently secular policies, to be deeply alarmed by the story. If true, it is simply the latest example of the dangerous intra-societal extremism that we are seeing increasingly in Israel, specifically, the extremism on either pole of the haredi-secular conflict.

Viva Press of our Israel bureau has filed a report in this issue (page 1) on the aftermath of last month's "protest Sunday" when a quarter-million Haredim demonstrated against the Supreme Court and 50,000 non-Haredim staged a counter-protest.

Her report paints a stark, discomforting picture of two camps that seem dug in against each other with very little initiative from either side to understand the other's anxieties.

Her article opens and closes with the irony of bus number 15 travelling its route through the many diverse sectors of the city, a unifying ribbon of sorts, tying together in a functional way, the different and disparate parts of the wondrous ancient modern city.

But what the Egged bus in Jerusalem achieves functionally, intolerance, disrespect and incivility tear down societally.

How can we stand idly by, merely watching in anger or in disbelief as this is happening?

How can we not protest the ascendancy of ugly, triumphal extremism?

Even from our distanced vantage in the Diaspora, we have an obligation to the state and to the people and to our common history and heritage, to speak out against the extremist bullies of all ideologies whose self-centred brutishness elbows away moderation and restraint in public discourse.

The cause of a vibrant, strong, democratic, Jewish Israel is too important for us merely to shrug our shoulders with a sense of helpless hopelessness.

For that matter, the cause of a vibrant, strong Jewish society in the Diaspora is too important for us merely to shrug our shoulders with a sense of helpless hopelessness.

We must therefore, encourage, nurture and publicize any and all forces that speak out on behalf of moderation within Israeli and Jewish society.

In that vein, I bring to the readers' attention two important recent developments.

Prof. Moshe Kaveh, the president of Bar-Ilan University, the "modern Orthodox" university in Israel, has recently undertaken a high profile public campaign calling for new guidelines of respectful, civil dialogue with the Haredi community.

In an interview he gave to Ha'aretz and in an article he wrote for Yediot Achronot regarding "protest Sunday" and the events that preceded it, Kaveh called for an end to the sway of the extremists.

"The extremist statements made recently by the leadership of the Ultra-Orthodox community against the Supreme Court and its Chief Justice have crossed all the lines of legitimate, acceptable criticism in a democratic society. Every citizen of this country who is concerned for the democratic and Jewish character of our society must stand up and say loudly: no more. This has gone too far.

"I say this, despite the fact that I too am critical of the legal and philosophical approach adopted by today's Supreme Court. There is indeed what to question about the way in which the Supreme Court justices have approached and ruled on matters of faith and religion. But... this is beside the point, we must stand up and strengthen the Supreme Court, an institution critical to the functioning of our democracy.

"The demonstrations ...against the Supreme Court, and the opposing demonstrations, leave the mistaken impression that the two values – Judaism and democracy – are contradictory and cannot together form the basis for modern Israel society. This is not the case."

Around the same time as Prof. Kaveh was pleading with the Israeli public, two philanthropic foundations across the ocean – in the United States – were also striking a blow on behalf of civility in Jewish life.

Gary Rosenblatt, the editor and publisher of the Jewish Week reported that the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Foundation in New York and the Sapirstein-Stone-Weiss Foundation in Cleveland have decided to "hold back funds from any group that transcends the boundaries of civil discourse."

As Rosenblatt correctly points out, "the point is not to stifle debate" but rather, to welcome it only if accompanied "by respect for the other's integrity."

We must all now join the battle for civility and mutual respect in Jewish life.

No war crimes 'witch-hunt,' ethnics assured

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ethnic communities should not fear that Ottawa's pursuit of modern-day war criminals is a witch-hunt, officials assured representatives of the multicultural media last week.

Officials also used the briefing to draw clear distinctions between the federal justice department's War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity unit, set up in 1987 to pursue Nazi-era war criminals; and the war crimes unit of Citizenship and Immigration Canada, begun in 1996 to pursue modern-day war criminals.

Officials attached to the Ontario region of the citizenship ministry's war crimes unit repeated their assurances that their efforts are not targeting members of any specific nationality or ethnic group.

"We have laws we abide by. This is not a witch-hunt," said Susan Davis, an advisor to the unit and a former national director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada.

Over the past decade, the Immigration Act has been amended several times to allow Canada to remove or refuse entry to anyone who has committed war crimes, crimes against humanity or crimes against peace, Carrie Storms, manager of the citizenship ministry's Ontario Region War Crimes Unit told journalists from several ethnic media outlets.

There were about 400 cases identified when the unit started up. Of those, some 100 people have been kicked out of Canada or refused entry.

"The objective is simple: to ensure Canada is not a safe haven for people who have committed war crimes or crimes against humanity," said Craig Goodes, the unit's senior director "We will be visible and aggressive, but we will respect the rule of law."

The unit was established out of a "nagging concern" that war criminals were among the thousands of new immigrants to Canada each year.

Recent media reports have painted Canada as a haven for war criminals and for those associated with Middle East terrorist groups.

Last summer, Ottawa earmarked an additional $47 million over three years to pursue war criminals inside Canada. The lion's share – $27 million – went to the citizenship and immigration ministry's war crimes branch; $17 million was allotted to the justice department's Nazi-era unit; and $2 million went to federal police and investigative operations.

The newer unit's mandate overlaps with several jurisdictions, including the Criminal Code, border controls and the Immigration and Refugee Board. Changes to the Immigration Act mean Canada can refuse entry to anyone suspected on "reasonable grounds" of having committed a war crime that would have been against the law in this country.

As well, the act prohibits entry to senior members or officials of a government, including heads of state, engaged in "terrorism, systematic or gross human rights violations, or war crimes, or crimes against humanity" within the Criminal Code's definition. An exception is made for those who have satisfied the government that their admission would not hurt the "national interest."

The Immigration Act specifies six governments and regimes where human rights abuses were prevalent. The law, however, is not limited to crimes committed in just those places.

The six are: Afghanistan's former Marxist regime; Haiti's Duvalier regime and a period following; Iraq's Saddam Hussein regime and that of his predecessor; the former Bosnia Serb republic of Srpska; several periods since 1990 in Rwanda; and the entire regime of President Siad Barre of Somalia.

Unit members recently toured the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre's museum and heard an address from a Holocaust survivor on the importance of pursuing war criminals.

Jewish medical ethics explored at forum

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Circumcision, the separation of conjoined twins, and even body piercing were addressed in a wide-ranging lecture on pediatric bioethics held recently for staff at the Hospital for Sick Children (HSC).

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation was the second speaker in a monthly series on Jewish Medical Ethics organized by Judy Kopelow, a registered nurse in the hospital's critical care unit, and sponsored by HSC's department of bioethics.

Kopelow is hopeful the series will lead to the development of a Toronto-based journal and conference. Upcoming speakers include Rabbi Gunther Plaut, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple; David Novak, chair of the University of Toronto's Jewish Studies program; and Dr. Michael Gordon of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Preservation of life is of paramount importance in Judaism, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl to an audience of about 30 Jewish and non-Jewish staff.

Although there is a prohibition against inflicting injury, it is permissible and even obligatory to cause injury (as in the case of surgery) for the purpose of preserving life, the rabbi said. The idea generally refers only to a well-established procedure, he added.

But even hazardous therapy and experimental surgery are permissible to secure relief from ongoing severe pain, he said.

The benefit to the general community is a consideration in the case of experimental surgery, the rabbi said. "Because of the rapidity of communication, every patient around the world is considered immediately before us."

For a long time, rabbinic authorities prohibited organ transplantation, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, but "as the benefits became clear and with the advent of treatment to deal with [rejection], we've now moved to an entirely different position."

In the event of a child's death, parents may authorize the donation of organs or tissues, he said. Anencephalic babies may not be kept alive for the purpose of donation, but donation is permitted if the child dies naturally, he added.

Parents are not in a position, however, to authorize living children under bar or bat mitzvah age to be kidney or bone marrow donors, said the rabbi.

Some of the most difficult cases from a medical ethics standpoint are those of conjoined twins. "If it's obvious that without surgery, both will die, there is significant rabbinic opinion that says you have to go ahead, and you select for survival the twin that is most likely to live. These cases are so difficult that whenever they've involved someone of a religious family, there's extensive rabbinic consultation."

On a lighter note, the rabbi said the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards of the Rabbinical Assembly (the umbrella body for Conservative rabbis) recently ruled that body piercing – which has been permitted at different times in Jewish history – is permissible provided it does not create a health hazard.

"We don't consider it self-mutilation, which is prohibited."

On this and other issues, the rabbi made a point of saying, there is a range of rabbinic opinion.

Tattooing, he noted, is prohibited by biblical law, although it doesn't preclude burial in a Jewish cemetery.

Cosmetic surgery can be a contentious issue, he indicated, adding that it is always permitted in the case of congenital or post-traumatic abnormalities. It is important from the perspective of Jewish law that esthetic surgery be defined in terms of medical indications rather than as cosmetic procedures, he said.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl encouraged medical personnel to be sensitive to the needs of Jewish families who may have specific requests such as opening sterile packages before Shabbat, or that a smaller dressing be used so a boy over 13 can put on tfillin.

The topic of circumcision generated the most discussion, with questions about the impossibility of a baby giving consent and about inflicting pain "given we have the ability to control it."

Anesthetic for circumcision has been "the subject of a lot of debate," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. The use of topical anesthetic seems to be permitted by many authorities, he said. Its use is not universally favored, however, because it tends to be slippery, according to both the questioner and the rabbi.

"It seems to me that the use of some mild anesthetic to reduce pain is beneficial, and I think that over the next few years we're going to see rabbinic opinion move in that way," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

From a religious standpoint, it is considered beneficial to circumcise an infant rather than to obligate him to undergo the procedure as an adult, the rabbi explained.

Under certain circumstances or medical conditions, he noted, circumcision may be postponed or even cancelled.

Seniors' craft work helps keep homeless warm

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mildred Margulies and her corps of crocheters and knitters at the Dorothy Klein Seniors Residence are on the hunt for donations of wool – Sayelle or any four-ply worsted – to make hats, scarves and mittens for homeless people at Holy Blossom Temple's Out of the Cold program.

Margulies, a member of the temple, wanted to help the weekly program (which offers dinner, overnight accommodation, breakfast and clothing to homeless people), but the thought of waking up at 5 a.m. to take a breakfast shift or committing to volunteer on winter evenings didn't seem practical to her.

Margulies, coordinator of the two-year-old knitting and crocheting group that meets weekly in her building, liked the idea of donating their handiwork.

The first time they made a donation, according to Margulies, a recipient said, "I can't remember the last time I had something to wear that nobody before me had worn."

That comment fuelled Margulies' determination to continue the project. Her group also collects money and toiletries to donate to the program. They have been using a combination of donated wool and material they've bought themselves.

The group's work is warm and colorful, adding a "homey touch," according to Bob Smolkin, chair of the temple's Out of the Cold committee, who is assisting them in seeking corporate donations.

"Just because we're old, don't write us off, you know," said Margulies, 76.

Group members range in age from 60 to mid-80s, and represent a variety of ethnic and religious backgrounds. They're – pardon the pun – a close-knit group, thriving on the companionship as much as the task at hand.

Not everyone knits or crochets for Out of the Cold, although over a dozen – more than half the members – do. But they all support each other in their efforts.

"It was too much money to get a teacher, so we decided we'd all teach and we'd all learn," said Margulies.

Octogenarian Nora Rennie is "an extremely good knitter, and she helps people who are just learning. One woman made a scarf. It took her a year to do it, but it's keeping somebody warm," said Margulies.

"The thing about the group," said 82-year-old Dena Sugarbroad, "is that everyone is so different. We come from all ethnic groups, and talk to each other, not just like friends but like sisters."

Sugarbroad, like Margulies, is a native of London, England. Others hail from Romania, Denmark, Ireland, Greece, Scotland, Portugal and Canada.

There were also a Lebanese and an Israeli woman who used to sit together and talk in Arabic, said Margulies.

Most of the women have other volunteer commitments as well. Sugarbroad serves on two committees of the Canadian Hearing Society and used to knit for premature babies in hospital. Anne Johnson, 82, a Roman Catholic nun, works on behalf of the Alzheimer Society.

Patricia Dinardo, at 60 the baby of the group, once knit 30 afghans for nursing home residents.

"If you're doing something for somebody, it makes you feel good," she said.

"They say, [if you want something done,] ask a busy person," said Sugarbroad.

Julia Sealy, 84, whose voice still carries the lilt of her native Trinidad, summed it up this way. "I like to help people."

Anyone who can help the group by donating supplies should call Margulies at 781-0200.

The message the premier refuses to hear

The National Assembly of Quebec reconvened last week with the expected, heated but tired rhetorical flourishes from Premier Lucien Bouchard. "Who cares what Quebec wants? This is the message [from English Canada] Quebecers must ponder." It was a variation of his standard demagogic theme that federated Canada oppresses independence-seeking Quebec.

Using the social union agreement recently signed by the federal government and the other nine provinces as his dramatic foil, the premier self-servingly reinterpreted that event using the dark and sinister images that have become his political trademark.

"English Canadians have decided that they want to be governed as a single, unified nation... We in Quebec have no quarrel with that resolve... as long as we are not bullied into following someone else's vision." (Our emphasis)

But no one is bullying Quebec. No one has forced Quebec to surrender its jurisdiction. Nor has anyone deprived Quebec of its share of the funds that will be transferred from the federal government to the provinces under the terms of the social union agreement, although in the weeks leading up to the opening of the Assembly, the government in Quebec did its best to suggest otherwise.

In a provocative three-part campaign of billboard propaganda described by Jeffrey Simpson in the Globe and Mail as "a series of wildly misleading ads," Bouchard's government suggested that Canadian federalism discriminated against Quebec in a number of ways: by giving disproportionately larger shares of transfer and investment funds to other provinces, notably Ontario, and by honoring the bills, in this case hydro bills, submitted by other provinces, namely Ontario again, but avoiding those of Quebec.

The truth of course was quite the contrary. The people of Quebec receive about a third of the total of federal transfer payments even though they comprise about one-quarter of the Canadian population. As for the unpaid bills, the federal government pays the bills approved by the auditor general. To their credit, federal ministers Stephane Dion and Marcel Masse quickly responded to the misinformation being officially disseminated by the government of Quebec.

The use of the language of confrontation, "as long as we are not bullied," and the images of deception are clearly intended by the premier to stir visceral responses among the "soft" federalists in Quebec, presumably as part of his efforts to help create "the winning conditions" for the next referendum.

But the people of Quebec understand and recognize the truth. They will not be fooled by amateurish and petty tirades from their government. They expect a mature, honest debate of the issues.

Part of what they expect is for the government as well to understand and recognize the truth. But most of the premier's political discourse suggests that he is either incapable of accepting or unwilling to accept the truth. For example, in his remarks at the opening of the Assembly, Bouchard told the deputies: "We must be frank and tell Quebecers that in the present Canadian context, there is a political price to pay for remaining undecided too long." (Our emphasis)

The truth, however, is that Quebecers are not undecided about their future. They have expressed a distinct and clear direction for their future. Twice now, even in the ambiguous, confusing referendum language drafted by two different separatist governments, the people of Quebec have rejected separatism. In the last provincial election, the majority voted against the Parti Québécois and its core separatist program.

Most Quebecers consistently send the same anti-separatist message to their separatist provincial government.

The premier of Quebec, however, refuses to hear it.

This is the real message that Quebecers must ponder.

Tuition leaves less for estates

Rabbi Marvin Pachino (CJN, Feb. 11), suggests that we should not accept government funding for Jewish day schools because they "might" reduce their support for education at some point in the future.

Due to the Ontario government's blatant discriminatory funding policy in education, not only are our children excluded from the type of education that the government provides to hundreds of thousands of others, but we are also unable to participate in the broad debate of government funding of education as do other citizens of Ontario.

Chicago's five percent solution is an interesting proposal. Before proceeding with an approach like this, I would first rather see that the $70 million that is lost annually due to tuition fees be restored to members of the Jewish community. Then we'll have much more for our own wealth in our estates to bequeath to Jewish education and other worthy causes at the time of our passing.

Reader responds to CJN's Gerber

In her Jan. 28 article, Jean Gerber attempts to connect the Jewish situation of 2,000 years ago to the Jewish situation today. Gerber makes a claim that ultra-Orthodox Jewry of today resembles the group known as the Zealots. From her article it is clear that she has very little grasp of Jewish history.

Unlike Gerber's assertion, the Zealots were not religious zealots, but rather political ones. The Zealots wanted to try to expel the Romans, in order to rid the Jewish people of oppressive Roman rule. In this respect, they are quite similar to the Jews who fought during the Warsaw Ghetto uprising in 1943. Both groups fought against a foreign power which had more troops and better equipment. Both groups had initial success, but were defeated. We may look back 2,000 years and decide that the Zealots fought a hopeless battle which was doomed to failure. However, just as the Warsaw Ghetto uprising is remembered by Jews all over the world as a symbol of courage, bravery and freedom, so were the battles between the Zealots and the Romans, such as Masada.

Finally, in her article, Gerber considers Rabbi Akivah a marginal figure. She seems to be unaware that he is a major figure in the Talmud and even in the Passover Haggadah. Another reason for his fame is his statement V'Ahavta l'reiacha kamokha – Zeh klal gadol ba'Torah – You should love your fellow (Jew) as you love yourself — this is an important clause in the Torah.

Perhaps Gerber should consider this the next time.

A despot receives mercy

It has been reported that Erich Priebke, who ordered the mass murder of 350 innocent people in the caves of Italy during World War II, has been released from jail to spend the rest of his sentence under house arrest. The reason given – Priebke's poor health.

The irony consists in the fact that mercy is being granted to him, though he did not show any to his victims. He deprived them of reaching the age he himself succeeded to. Their souls are probably crying that for what he did to them, he should not only spend the rest of his life in jail, but rather rot in hell. That would also send a message to future despots.

Can life be beautiful in a concentration camp?

Concerning the movie Life is beautiful, I am waiting for a comment from one of our Jewish leaders on the propriety of using a concentration camp as a background for a kind of fun game.

The Holocaust deniers will jump on the opportunity to start "educating" the next generation with this kind of movie. For example, True love in Treblinka: The SS commander and the rabbi's daughter. Or maybe a musical, The merry SS women dancers of Majdanek. An insidious way to "bagatellise" the horrible past, and show that it really was not so bad. After all, they will say, "I saw it in the movies."

Researching partisans' history pulled at the heart

By ALLAN LEVINE
Special to The CJN

Never before had historical research invaded my dreams and tormented my sleep; never before had tears come to my eyes while sitting at a desk in the library. But then, there is nothing normal or routine when it comes to writing on the Holocaust.

My research project concerned the wartime fate of the thousands of Jews, mainly in eastern Poland, Belorussia, Ukraine and the three Baltic States, who had miraculously survived the war by hiding or fighting in the forests as partisans. They lived a precarious day-to-day existence, eluding Nazi hunts as well as unfriendly Soviet, Polish and Ukrainian guerrilla fighters who often killed first and asked questions later.

The tears came on a day in April 1996. Perhaps it was the accumulation of many hours of full-time listening to Holocaust survivor testimonies, each one a catalogue of misery and death. I am not sure. But alone one afternoon in the majestic surroundings of a large wood-paneled reading room at the Yale University library, this particular story told in a video testimony by a woman named Fruma pulled at my heart.

The odd thing, was that Fruma's recollections were similar to so many others that I had already researched: how during the chaos of an aktion (a Nazi raid on a ghetto), final farewells were said to parents and siblings, and survival was usually a combination of courage, an instinct for self-preservation and sheer luck.

Fruma and her sister-in-law saved themselves by hiding in a cesspool of human waste, where they remained for six excruciating days. But Fruma's father had stubbornly refused to flee. As she remembered many years later, he stood in his small ghetto shack wearing his tallit, waiting for the Nazis to find him.

"He looked at me and did not say one word," she related. "He was saying goodbye with his eyes. I could not say [anything]."

After that day, Fruma did not see her father again.

My nightmares had begun much earlier than April, soon after I had started research on the unspeakable brutality perpetuated by the dreaded Einsatzgruppen, Hitler's mobile death squads that were dispatched east following the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union (and Soviet-occupied territory) in June 1941. The soldiers had been specifically trained to cleanse the regions of Jews, or in the language of the German bureaucrats, to make it Judenfrei (free of Jews).

Outside of Vilna, near the Polygon, a locked compound four kilometres from the town of Swieciany, and at the massive death pits at Babi Yar, close to Kiev – among only a few of the killing sites – the annihilation of European Jews began in earnest.

After a day of reading Nazi reports and eyewitness accounts of the mass murder, I shut my eyes at night only to be besieged by vivid images of young children being flung into the pits alive, of naked Jews lined up like animals for the slaughter, of the Germans filming the killings for posterity, of the blood-soaked ground still convulsing two days later after wounded men, women and children were buried alive.

Partisan fighter Ben Lungen (right) and Red Army soldier Max Banschick in Munich, Germany in August 1945.

It is, of course, one thing to read and hear about such tragic events, quite another to have such terrible memories etched in your mind forever. That is just one of the many burdens Holocaust survivors have been forced to live with.

Forty years ago, there were only a handful of books about the Holocaust; today there are hundreds. The trial of Adolf Eichmann, one of the architects of the Nazi's Final Solution, in Jerusalem in 1962, is generally credited with generating this remarkable output of scholarship documenting each tragic step in the destruction of European Jews.

As the Holocaust became an acceptable subject of academic and journalistic inquiry, the victims of this horror gradually began to grant interviews, write their memoirs and speak publicly about their ordeal.

Archival projects in Israel and the United States – including most notably Steven Spielberg's impressive Shoah project, which when completed will have recorded on video the testimonies of more than 50,000 survivors around the world – probably now makes the Holocaust one of the most documented events in the 20th century. And yet despite this prodigious record, serious questions, selective memory and outright distortions about the basic facts of the Holocaust continue to be raised.

The recent and heated debate about Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's visit to Auschwitz makes it clear that sensitive and emotional controversies still swirl around the history of those dark years. Perhaps they always will.

The process of preserving the survivors' own stories thus has taken on an even more important significance. But the work has been slow and painful. When they first began rebuilding their broken lives after the war had ended, mainly in North American and Israel (then Palestine), the survivors rarely spoke of what had happened to them – how they had watched the Einsatzgruppen murder their families, how they had been herded into ghettos, how they had survived in concentration and slave labor camps or by fleeing into the forests to fight as partisans.

For many, not only were these memories too immediate and too painful to recall, but also, their North American friends and relatives initially did not want to hear about those terrible times. Who would have believed such wild stories in any event? "During the [50s], we met with a number of American Jews, and I have to say it was extremely difficult to talk with them about the Holocaust," former partisan Jack Sutin, now living in Minneapolis, told me. "Not because we were unwilling or afraid to speak, but because they simply could not understand. Especially when I started to tell them about our time with the Jewish partisans. I had the feeling that they didn't believe what I was saying."

So Sutin, like others, remained silent, troubled in sleep by nightmares of attack dogs and whips, racked by guilt that they alone among their loved ones had walked out of the woods to start their lives over again.

Many married and had children (some, who had lost their first spouses and families during the war, for the second time) and continued the Jewish traditions that they had been taught in another world, in another time.

As they reached middle age, many former partisans, more able to speak and cope with the memory of their experiences than those who had suffered the horrors of Auschwitz, Majdanek, Dachau and the other death camps, began to write their memoirs and deliver public presentations to high school students. They realized, finally, that it was their duty and obligation to set the historical record straight, as painful as it was. Who else could tell the world about the Jewish people who were nearly obliterated from the face of the earth? Who else could recount the amazing chronicle of their resistance?

As I began contacting survivors who I wanted to interview, many were instantly agreeable to my requests to speak with them, some were initially skeptical and wondered about my motives, given that my parents were not Holocaust survivors. A few refused, citing one excuse or another. It took nearly a year of negotiation before one man finally consented to sit down with me.

One highlight was when – with the help of my brother-in-law Jeff Morrison, who speaks Yiddish – I was able to track down Chil Grynszpan, who once led a renowned Jewish resistance detachment in the forests of eastern Poland. After the war, Grynszpan immigrated to Brazil where he now lives. In a lengthy telephone conversation, Jeff was able to communicate with his wife in Yiddish and then with his son Mario, who eventually interviewed his ailing father for me.

As it turned out, on my research travels throughout North America, Europe and Israel, I was able to visit the Parczew forest, south- east of Warsaw, where Grynszpan and his courageous men once fought. That day in May of 1996, standing among the tall pine and birch trees, it was difficult to envision what had transpired so many years earlier.

The best way to describe my visit to Poland is to compare it to a visit to a museum of lost civilizations. You can still see the remnants of a rich and diverse Jewish culture in old synagogues now serving as restaurants and movie theatres.

In time, I understood the apprehensions of some of the survivors. Indeed, interviewing Holocaust survivors or reading their testimonies and memoirs is an experience you can never forget.

To hear a survivor's personal account is traumatic and moving. The interview sessions, which always began with happy memories of childhood, parents and schools, eventually ended in tears and recollections of horror no person should have to live with.

Each time I concluded these interviews, I could not help being awed by the survivor's strength and emotional will-power. Though an emotionally draining ordeal, these last survivors of the Holocaust persevere, now more than ever.

As they reach their late 60s and 70s, they know they have a special mission to perform. It is not to lay blame, but rather to record and preserve the past – to fulfil a mitzvah. No one could or should ask anything more from them than that.

Election sure to sharpen divisions

Like the country itself, elections in Israel are intense and unpredictable. But this election campaign will have one predictable outcome – it will sharpen, rather than attenuate, differences and divisions.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

If the Knesset after the 1996 election was a mirror image of divisions in Israeli society, the current election campaign reflects them with even greater force. In a crowded political arena, politicians and would-be politicians are jostling for position and are exploiting any possible issue to guarantee them a moment in the spotlight, which they hope will translate into political support.

The media, in a talk-show frenzy, are catering to the need for exposure, which they in turn, hope will translate into stronger ratings. The result is an aggressive, personalized and confrontational campaign, unsavory to the observer, and troubling to those involved.

First, there is the show of political power by the haredi community, ostensibly challenging the judicial activism of the Supreme Court under the leadership of Chief Justice Aharon Barak. In truth, the issue cuts far deeper.

The concern of the haredi parties in Israel is that the independent, activist court will challenge legislative gains that they have made through the pressures available to them in the political process. The potent mix of political power, religious ideology and virulent personal attacks has made it virtually impossible to conduct the debate on the merits of the issue. And mounting the assault on the court at the height of an election campaign has guaranteed that the reaction of other political figures is tempered by their own political agendas.

A second, hot-button issue is the so-called ethnic factor. In both Labor and Likud, the senior slot – after Ehud Barak and Shimon Peres, and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu respectively – on the party list was won by a politician of Middle Eastern origin, Mizrachi in the current Israeli parlance. The ascendance of Silvan Shalom, minister of science in the Likud government, and historian and former diplomat Shlomo Ben-Ami, the neophyte Labor politician, has been hailed as further evidence of the ethnic revolution in Israeli politics. But the focus of ethnic dissatisfaction has moved to other minority groups. The Ethiopian community's grievances are the rallying cry of former Labor MK Addisu Massala, who has lost the chance of a realistic seat in the next Knesset.

Politically, the more significant developments are within the Arab Israeli community and among the Russian immigrants. Both Labor and Likud can count on a hard core of supporters, but both also require significant blocs of other voters to gain a majority in the Knesset, or for that matter, in the prime ministerial election. If for Likud, the haredi vote has been virtually assured over the last several elections, Labor has been able to depend on the Arab vote and the Arab parties' support in the Knesset.

The new electoral system, in which the voters vote directly for the prime minister, has created new opportunities and new strains in this pattern. Arab voters can now cast the vote of their choice for the Knesset party, and can offer their prime ministerial vote to the highest bidder. Like other Israeli voters, the Arab citizens care about domestic budgets for education and development, and Netanyahu is making big promises to buy their vote.

Since Ehud Barak is not viewed as an authentic "dove" on the peace issue, and since his message to the centrist Israeli voter is bound to sound too hawkish for most Arab voters in any case, the Arabs are making it very clear that they cannot be taken for granted.

Within the Russian immigrant community, the situation is no less fragmented. Natan Sharansky's seniority as the premier Russian-Israeli politician is being challenged by Avigdor Liberman, formerly Netanyahu's right-hand man. Speaking as the ultimate outsider, Liberman's announcement of his new party was accompanied by a scorching attack on the country's "elites" – the police, the judiciary, and the media.

He will call on his supporters to vote for Netanyahu, while Sharansky will have to differentiate his message to gain support for his party and for the prime ministerial candidate of his choice. It is unlikely to be Barak, but it may be Itzik Mordechai of the centrist party.

Finally, there is Labor's attempt to broaden its base through One Israel, an umbrella that can accommodate both Labor and satellite parties. Admittedly, at the expense of some seats for aspiring Labor politicians, Barak has signed agreements with the moderate religious party, Meimad, and with David Levy's party, Gesher.

For Barak, these represent an appeal to groups in the community that may find it difficult to cast a vote for Labor. For the satellite parties themselves, the Labor umbrella guarantees post-election positions. In this case, the coalition negotiations have, in effect, already taken place.

Holocaust overload in fiction and art

The Oscar season is upon us. Among the contenders for best picture is Roberto Benigni's Life is Beautiful.

I have not seen Benigni's acclaimed tragi-comedy about a father and son relationship set against the backdrop of the destruction of Italian Jewry. For some time, I have declined to see any films directly dealing with the Holocaust, although I made an exception for Schindler's List. I have also been observing a self-imposed moratorium on the reading of Holocaust-related fiction and viewing of similar theatre.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

I am well aware of the wonderful works of art that have wrestled with the horror and ambiguities of the Holocaust, and I used to consume them regularly: The Pawnbroker, Sophie's Choice, The Dance of Gengis Cohn, The Man in the Glass Booth, the writings of Elie Wiesel and Primo Levi. Greek composer Mikis Theodorakis' Mauthausen is deeply moving. So is artwork from or about the Shoah. I recommend them all.

But for some time, I have felt Holocaust overload from the world of the arts and entertainment. I obviously do not reject the possibility or desirability of artistic treatment of unspeakable horror. And I still read works of historical analysis about the war and its aftermath, like Daniel Goldhagen's provocative Hitler's Willing Executioners.

But no more movies or best-selling fiction, at least not for me, and not now. I recall my father, alav hashalom, watching the TV show Hogan's Heroes and getting angry at the depiction of the clownish German officers, Col. Klink and Sgt. Schultz. My father, a survivor, knew that those in charge of PoW camps were not soft-hearted buffoons.

I think I can understand the muse that inspired Benigni's treatment of survival in the camps as a game for his child, replete with its moments of hilarity. After all, I recall laughing at Mad magazine's satires of Nazis, with articles like The Warm and Witty Side of Heinrich Himmler. But I am not certain of the message that this sends out and its impact at this time. I can understand voices in the Jewish community who have felt that his treatment also demeans the ordeal of the survivors and the victims.

Of course there was still humor in the ghettos, and even – albeit less – in the camps. Perhaps that is one of the subliminal messages of this film. But the Shoah was, and is, no joke, and the camps were no fantasy.

The Holocaust denial movement seems to be thriving. The Globe and Mail recently ran a lengthy op-ed story about the failed deportation of an alleged Canadian Nazi war criminal. These stories trigger a barrage of criticism of Jewish organizations for supporting vengeful "witch hunts" against old men and are used by deniers for their ends.

The Holocaust seems to be growing in importance in news events. We have new claims, and not only by Jews, against German and other European banks, corporations and museums for bank accounts, stolen gold, insurance policies, works of art and slave labor. This is not vengeance but justice long delayed and denied, a much needed moral cleansing, which I support fully.

But in the midst of this swirl of legal events, the Jewish community continues to use the Holocaust as a central vehicle of identity and socialization. Alienated Jewish intellectuals can use Holocaust books and films as a tie to their heritage, a non-demanding alternative to keeping kosher or going to synagogue. Everywhere there are symposia, institutes, academic chairs, museums, memorials, centres, curricula, political sloganeering, pilgrimages of adults and teens. Perhaps we are still making up for the silences of the immediate post-war period. But what does this mean for the Jewish present and future?

I feel the need for some communal introspection and stocktaking. On a personal level, I now feel sufficiently confused that I am no longer receptive to artistic interpretations of the Holocaust, of ever increasing subtlety. This is a reflection of my own search, not a comment on those works or their audience.

Outlawing the panhandlers

A recent article in the Globe & Mail by Arthur Schafer highlights the fact that an increasing number of communities in Canada, led by Winnipeg and Vancouver, have outlawed panhandling and made it, in fact, a criminal offence. Just in case my readers think that we in Ontario are exempt from this latest cure for poverty, let me add quickly that Ottawa, Oshawa, Kingston and others have also introduced similar legislation. In Winnipeg, the bylaws circumscribe the possible activities of beggars, and if they violate the regulations, threaten them with a thousand-dollar fine or a jail term of up to six months, or both.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I presume that the introduction of these restrictions and threats against the weakest part of our population has three reasons:

- That begging is done agressively and threateningly. But if that were the case, it would be unnecessary to enact these bylaws, for the Criminal Code already prohibits such behavior.
- Increasingly, people feel annoyed or embarrassed when they see the outstretched hand and the open hat, and feel that their enjoyment of life is somehow curtailed when they come that close to the other side of existence. (Maybe they even think that most beggars and squeegee kids are really entrepreneurs with bank accounts, who have chosen to make such activity their living.)
- There is embarrassment when somebody begs us to contribute money, while we are unwilling or unable to reply with the request and therefore feel we have been put on the spot.

None of these reasons is sufficiently compelling to take away from a tiny proportion of the population the right to ask for charity. Begging is a demeaning activity to start with, and I rather think there is not one in a thousand who enjoys doing it.

Another feature of our dubious sentiments is this: It brings to our minds the inadequacy of our social safety network and therefore leaves us with a feeling of systemic inadequacy. We don't like our day's activities soured by that recognition, for we know well enough that the poor and the homeless are still amongst us. The Torah says, in fact, that this will always be the case – despite its oft-repeated injunction to take care of those with whom life has dealt harshly.

Managing to sweep one aspect of poverty under the rug of public conscience does not eliminate the problem. Schafer admits that in some instances, businesses or even neighborhoods may feel imposed upon when too many panhandlers appear to bar one's way. But that too is the exception.

Maybe, as long as people are compelled to ask someone else for help, we ought to be prepared with some change in our pockets to make these small payments a part of the daily routine. I always remember, on my first visit to Tel Aviv many years ago, a young man's careening from one side of the street to the other. When I asked him what he was looking for, he said: "It's erev Shabbes, and I must find someone in need to whom I can give tzedakah."

That was Judaism at its best: a religion that makes tzedakah an act, not of occasional charity, but of constant obligation.

The Kirshner File

Niv Fichman reaps success in film

"It was a nerve-wracking night," said Niv Fichman. "You can never be sure you'll win. So many factors come into play. You never know. You can't call it."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Fichman, 41, one of the founding partners of Rhombus Media – a Canadian company which specializes in films about the performing arts – was certainly nervous on the eve of last month's Genie Awards ceremony in Toronto.

Two of the movies he had produced, The Red Violin and Last Night, were up for prizes. "I was very, very much involved with these films. Both are my babies." He needn't have worried. The Red Violin and Last Night, directed respectively by Francois Girard and Don McKellar, made off with 11 Genies, presented by the Academy of Canadian Cinema and Television. "It was a great night," gushed the normally reserved Fichman, who holds dual Canadian-Israeli citizenship.

It has truly been an astonishing year for Fichman and Rhombus Media. Besides winning kudos in Canada, The Red Violin and Last Night garnered critical recognition abroad. And two of its documentaries, Yo-Yo Ma: Inspired by Bach and The War Symphonies: Shostakovich Against Stalin, captured an Emmy.

Fichman's pleasure in winning the raves of his peers, though, is tempered by his perception that Canadians generally give homegrown movies short shrift. "I wish more people would go see more Canadian films," he groused. "And I wish the press was more supportive."

Fichman, who has produced and directed dozens of films, and who has collaborated with such musicians as Yehudi Menuhin and Seiji Ozawa, founded Rhombus Media 20 years ago with Barbara Willis Sweete when they were in the same cinema class at York University. "We worked well together and decided to continue." Since then, they have taken on additional partners: Larry Weinstein, Sheena Macdonald and Danny Iron.

Rhombus Media's first film, Opus 1 Number 1, a documentary which traces the evolution and performance of oven piano concerto, encouraged Fichman and Sweete to remain in the business.

The partners have made, among other movies, Thirty-Two Short Films About Glenn Gould, Long Day's Journey Into the Night (adapted from Eugene O'Neil's play), September Songs: The Music of Kurt Weill and When the Fire Burns: The Life & Music of Manuel de Falla.

In the main, their films either break even or eke out a modest profit. But, Fichman hastens to add, the per capita return is impressive, and perhaps the best in the Canadian industry.

Rhombus Media's films are so financially structured that big profits are not absolutely necessary. "We have to recoup $3 million for The Red Violin to break even. The chances are good, since it hasn't yet opened in the United States. As for Last Night, its gross so far is good relative to its budget."

Fichman, who once studied piano and who's on the board of the Canadian Opera Company, clearly enjoys making films about the performing arts. And so does Sweete, a pianist. "We have a preference for arts films. It's our niche. Maybe I'm sensitive to music. All our contacts are in that field. We kind of got slotted into that subject area. There are few companies like ours in North America. We're fairly unique. It's a great field. It's fantastic."

Based in a rustic old building in the downtown core, Rhombus Media is run along cooperative lines, and profits are plowed back into the firm. "We've created a utopian, idealistic kind of company," explained Fichman, an amiable man whose curly salt-and-pepper hair matches his black clothing.

"We all take an equal, modest salary, and we have never had any fights about money. We haven't grown wealthy, but in terms of quality of life, we have amazing lives. We've stuck by our ideals. I wouldn't trade this life for anything."

Fichman, who's single, is constantly on the road, but is frugal with his spending. He travels economy class on trans-Atlantic flights and stays in lower-cost hotels whenever possible. "As poor as I am, I'm an air miles millionaire," he chuckled.

Born in Tel Aviv, he comes from an arts-oriented family. His brother, Yuval, who appeared in Opus 1 Number 1, is a pianist. His sister, Dalit, used to be a dancer. Ted, his Romanian-born father, is an amateur pianist. Ziva, his mother, a teacher and a Sabra from Jerusalem whose parents hail from Odessa, loves music.

The Fichmans left Israel in 1967 after Ted Fichman, a structural engineer, decided there were more opportunities in Canada. He arrived in Toronto several months before the outbreak of the Six Day War, and sent for his wife and children shortly afterward. Fichman, who hardly spoke a word of English when he set foot in Toronto, graduated from George S. Henry Secondary School in Don Mills.

Raised in the Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Aviv, he has vivid reminiscences of Israel. One of Fichman's sharpest memories is of Yitzhak Rabin personally driving him and his mother to a school concert in 1963 or 1964, when he was chief of staff and his son, Yuval, was Ziva's student.

"He made me sit beside him, and I asked all kinds of questions about the gadgets in the car. My mother was none too pleased, but he insisted on patiently explaining everything."

Fichman also recalls visiting Jerusalem before the Six Day War and peering past coils of barbed wire into the Jordanian side of the divided city.

Eight years old during the Six Day War, he remembers it as an exciting time when air raid sirens sounded and civilians rushed into shelters.

Since leaving the country, Fichman, who speaks a passable Hebrew, has been back to Israel four or five times. The last occasion was nine years ago, when he was a guest of the Jerusalem Film Festival and toured Israel in the company of Canadian director, Atom Egoyan, and his wife.

"I haven't had the urge to go back on a return visit because most Israelis are not sympathetic to ex-Israelis," he admitted. (He has, however, toyed with the idea of a film about the Israel Philharmonic, which he describes as "an amazing orchestra.")

Niv Fichman

"I constantly had to explain and defend myself, even though it was not my decision to leave Israel. I've made a meaningful life here, and I don't feel I have to justify myself. Plus, I'm against what's happening in Israel today."

Succinctly put, Fichman, who follows developments in Israeli politics, is no fan of Benjamin Netanyahu and his Likud government. In recent years, however, Fichman's views have become more centrist.

He supported Rabin's rapprochement with the PLO in 1993. "I was excited by his initiative. I felt there was an end in sight to all the problems." He believes that the Palestinians are entitled to statehood, so long as Israel's security needs are met.

Fichman, whose films are unabashedly apolitical, is currently developing a number of new projects, but declines to elaborate. "We're in the very early stages, and the situation could change next week."

He is confident about the future of the Canadian film industry. "We've spent time building a critical mass of innovative filmmakers, and all of them, from Egoyan to Girard, are maturing and are at the top tier of world cinema. We've reached a good place."

And so has Rhombus Media.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The paschal lamb today

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The seder is a wonderful paradigm for education precisely because it confounds our notions of what constitutes an appropriate question or a fitting answer.

For example, the "wise son," who asks all about "laws and statutes" of the holiday, receives an answer that seems obtuse and almost absurdly limited: "Don't eat anything after the korban Pesach." (Today we have no paschal lamb, so it means we don't eat after the afikoman.) Why is this a good response for the wise child?

The origins of the paschal lamb sacrifice can be found in Chapter 12 of the Book of Exodus. After sitting by and watching God perform the 10 plagues, the Jewish people are commanded by God to take an extraordinary step, one that would indicate their willingness to leave the ways of Egypt behind, for as Rashi explains, "sheep were regarded by the Egyptians as deities."

Before I redeem you, God asks, are you willing to spurn the ideology of Egypt, with its polytheistic worship of nature? The Jews had to exhibit the courage to buck the trends of the prevailing culture as a prelude to receiving the new way of life embodied in the revelation of the Torah.

When we inform the wise child that nothing comes after the consuming of the lamb/afikoman, what we're really telling him is that total commitment to one God, symbolized by the korban Pesach, is the ultimate goal of Jewry, and that allegiance to it is ultimately the last thing that we should "taste of" on this night. So the paschal lamb becomes a kind of group identity symbol, a way of saying that I identify with the Jewish nation, with its struggles and triumphs and needs. In line with this, the law in Temple times was that non-Jews were forbidden to eat of the korban Pesach.

Whether the ancient pagans experienced this social ostracization as a blow to their ego is open to historical guesswork. But in contemporary Jewish life,we all know who is coming to dinner: your intermarried brother and his spouse; your non-Jewish friend from work who is "just curious." But Passover is not a spectator sport, nor for all of the attempts to make it into such, a primarily universalist holiday. Nonetheless, non-Jewish seder participation is a current inevitability. So why not put that participation to a serious challenge, free of awkward politeness or patronization?

No doubt the politically correct manoeuvre at the seder table would be to utterly avoid any reference to the distinctions between Judaism and other religions, between Jews and gentiles. To focus on the idea of Exodus as a universal symbol of liberation.

But wouldn't it be far more powerful, and in an odd way, probably a big favor to all concerned, to at some point in the evening, confront the whole idea of whether Judaism is unique and in what way? And why to be attached to a Jewish person through marriage or otherwise, should entail a serious understanding of what Judaism is. That is, if only the Jewish partner could take it seriously.

We didn't escape from slavery only to soft-pedal our identity as Jews. Torah as the Talmud insistently reminds us, is a treasure house, and there should be entrance requirements to gain the benefits of that treasure. The korban Pesach is a symbol of our national unity and purpose. No matter what you achieve as an individual, there's "nothing that can be consumed," that goes beyond, as it were, our destiny as a nation.

The humble matzah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The panic is beginning to set in. With only three weeks until Passover, kitchen cupboards are getting a meticulous cleaning, store shelves are being stocked with unbelievable new Passover products and shoppers are careening down aisles tossing everything in sight into their carts.

But today, I want to focus that classic, simple food that is the heart of the holiday: matzah.

It all started in Exodus where we are commanded to "eat matzah for seven days. By the first day, you must have your homes cleared of all leaven." (Exodus 12:15) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/exodus/torah/12151215.htm]

Much has been written about the symbolic meaning of matzah and its place in the formation of a people [http://www.knet.co.za/matzah/symbolis.htm]. "The ritual surrounding the consumption of the plain, simple matzah has become a symbolic way of removing the 'puffiness' (arrogance, pride) from the soul, as well as a call to assist those who are in need. The eating of this humble food is said also to assist one to cultivate to the trait of humility, as humility is the beginning of liberation."

Although most of us are used to stopping by the store to pick up a few boxes of machine-made matzah from companies like Manischewitz [http://www.manischewitz.com/] or Israel's Matzot Rishon [http://www.matza.co.il/], hand-made shmurah Matzot are gaining in popularity. David Kibbe has captured the dedication and devotion to detail needed to make these matzot. He follows Satmar Chassidim of Kiryas Joel, N.Y., who work for three months next to the stifling heat of 1,200-degree ovens to bake kosher hand-made matzot [http://www.th-record.com/Archive/April/22-30/bakers.htm].

Apparently, shmurah Matzah is gaining in popularity outside the ultra-Orthodox community [http://www.jta.org/features/17-matz.htm]. Randi Jaffe says members of her Reform temple don't care that it's shmurah or ritually perfect:

"It's the fact that it's round and bumpy and doesn't look like the square, perfect ones. It's a much more palpable connection to the ancient tradition. You can really imagine it going on someone's shoulder and baking in the desert sun as the biblical Exodus story tells us the original matzah did while our ancestors fled their slavery in Egypt, heading for a new world."

Many children and adults now get a chance to bake their own matzot at Model Matzah Bakeries operated by Chabad Lubavitch. You can follow along as the kids of Congregation Beth Sholom of Corona, Calif., transform flour and water into the ancient food [http://www.uscj.org/pacsw/corona/Matzah.html]. If you don't have access to a matzah bakery, you can watch an online video of how matzah is made [http://www.matzahs.com/matzo_video.html].

And if you'd like to try it at home, take a look at Marcy Goldman's recipe for homemade matzah. [http://www.marketnet.com/mktnet/kosher/Resource/matzoh.html] As Marcy mentions, her recipe is not in accordance with Passover law and should not be used for the holiday. But it can be fun to see how your work compares to that of the professionals.

Matzah has been around for over three centuries. But what of its future?

As a sure sign that matzot have really made it, we need only look to the centre of the trend universe – Hollywood. After last year's Academy Awards, chef-to-the-stars Wolfgang Puck tried something different [http://www.flashnews.com/news/9tin5th1.htm]. He served 1,600 Tinsel Town biggies high-calorie hors d'oeuvres including salmon on Oscar-shaped matzah crackers.

No word on their availability at your local supermarket. Yet.

The season of miracles

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

As soon as we finish celebrating Purim we get ready for Pesach. We can learn a great deal from both the differences and the common features of the two holidays.

Both celebrate significant historical events when the Jewish people were in great peril due to the stubbornness and foolishness of kings, yet in both cases we were ultimately redeemed.

On Pesach, the Almighty, through astounding miracles, brought the Jewish people out of Egypt, an event we recall not only at the seder but in our everyday prayers.

The miracles of Purim teach us that while we must always have faith in God, at times God challenges us to take the first steps in dealing with problems.

While Mordecai and Esther fasted and prayed, they also devised a plan to thwart Haman and save the Jewish community. Thus, we see that the Jewish people have the capacity to overcome almost impossible odds through a combination of devotion to God and creative action.

The miracles of Purim and Pesach to a certain degree parallel some of the modern miracles we have witnessed since the darkest days of the Holocaust, when darkness and despair reigned in the Jewish world. The establishment of the State of Israel, its victories in wars over vast Arab armies, the miraculous happenings of the Six Day War, and the successful integration of millions of Jews from Russia, Arab, Ethiopian and western democratic countries will go down in modern Jewish history as a series of unbelievable miracles.

Yet, perhaps we can find smaller miracles in our own backyards. While in 1999 the high percentage of assimilation and intermarriage is staggering, there is nevertheless much room for hope and optimism.

Many young Jews besides renewing or beginning Jewish studies are reviewing and strengthening their commitment to Judaism on various levels, often influencing their parents to make certain changes in their lifestyle. One of the best ways of insuring greater observance of Judaism is to understand the importance and need for Jewish studies for children, teenagers and adults.

In fact, the real goal of Jewish education is to strengthen the Jewish home, cementing the bond between parents and children.

A wonderful example of this is the Pesach seder, whzere young children are encouraged to ask their parents questions, creating dialogue and excitement in the home. Ideally, it is the parents' responsibility to teach their children the importance of the seder and Pesach as it is written in Exodus, chapter 21, verse 8 – "and you shall tell your son (or your daughter) on that day."

Furthermore, the Torah calls upon the parents throughout the year to teach their children the observance of mitzvot, as we say in the Shema every day "and you shall tell your children."

A Jewish education, whether through day or afternoon school, is not complete without reinforcement at home. If the child learns about the beautiful rituals and customs that encompass Judaism, but then sees little interest at home, he or she receives a confused message and the lessons learned in school will not likely have the permanent impact they deserve.

Children should also see that their parents are interested in the Bible and in Jewish learning. This will ensure that Hebrew education has a practical application at home and elsewhere and be the most positive factor for vibrant, dynamic, observant families in Israel and throughout the Jewish world.

Rabbi Kelman is rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Extremism in Israel

Books
Bernard Baskin

Brother Against Brother*, by Ehud Sprinzak (The Free Press, $41).

This is an alarming book. The author, a professor of political science at the Hebrew University, summarizes 30 years of study and observation of extremism and violence in Israel public life.

In June 1948, the very year of Israel's creation, there was a bloody confrontation between left and right political factions over the Altalena, an arms ship brought from Europe by Menachem Begin, head of the Irgun, an underground organization. The ship, beached at Tel Aviv with weapons and passengers, was shelled, and sunk under the orders of Prime Minister Ben-Gurion, who insisted on a unitary army and a single line of command. This battle between the newly formed army and the Irgun led to the loss of some 20 lives. "It was the closest the nation ever came to civil war," concludes the author.

Among the many episodes of violence discussed, are the assassination of Count Bernadotte, the UN mediator in the 1948 war; the gunning down in 1957 of Israel Kastner, a leader of wartime Hungarian Jewry under German occupation, who was charged by the extreme right of collaborating with the Nazis; the seamen's strike of 1951, which led to the dissolution of the leftist Palmach striking force; and the sporadic violence of the Haredim, who wage fierce struggles against transportation on the Sabbath, archeological digging in ancient graveyards, the facilitating of human organ transplantation and sexual deviation within the community.

The author also pays attention to the disaffection and alienation of the Sephardi community, which led to the Black Panther protest movement of the early 1970s as well as the earlier Wadi Salib, food riots in Haifa, Acre and other places.

Many readers will be unfamiliar with the formation of a Jewish underground that conspired to blow up the Muslim Dome of the Rock on Jerusalem's Temple Mount in the late 1970s, the attack on Arab mayors in 1980, and the attempt to blow up five buses full of Arab passengers.

Not overlooked, is the message of violence preached by Rabbi Meir Kahane, who founded the Kach party, as well as the consternation in Israel that followed the murder of the peace activist Emil Greentzweig in 1983.

In 1994, Dr. Baruch Goldstein, dressed as a captain in the Israeli Army, entered the Cave of the Patriarchs in the West Bank town of Hebron and opened fire on Muslim worshippers. In fewer than three minutes, 29 were killed and more than 100 were wounded.

Perhaps the apex of violence was reached with the murder of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin by Yigal Amir. The author believes that Amir was not part of a cabal or conspiracy, but was influenced by an uncompromising nationalism, combined with religious extremism, that demonized Israeli leaders.

Despite the history of political violence, Sprinzak feels that given the foreign and domestic pressures in Israel, things could be far worse.

He argues that Israeli political life is, in fact, marked by relative restraint, and that a violent civil war remains only a remote possibility.

The author writes, "Having long observed violent movements in several western societies, I am convinced that had the French, Italians, Germans, Americans, and most likely any other westerners been subject to existential threats as well as divisive issues similar to the ones experienced by the Israelis, blood would have flooded their streets.

"The brutalities committed by Israeli extremists pale in comparison with the atrocities committed by other nationals in the modern era. There is only one explanation for this exceptional self-control: Jewish internal solidarity and the presence of non-violent taboos in Jewish society and culture."

The book's underlying assumption, is that when peace finally comes and the great debate over secure boarders is resolved, political violence will decline dramatically. A hope, to which one must offer a fervent Amen.

Purim at the Bloor JCC

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Purim revellers stepped from the busy downtown street of the '90s into a time warp at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

The gym had been transformed to recreate the old downtown Jewish quarter for the annual Purim carnival sponsored by the JCC, Ashkenaz: A festival of new Yiddish culture, and the Downtown Jewish Community Council.

The sights and sounds evoking memories of Jewish cultural life during the early decades of this century drew an estimated 400 people.

"It has a wonderful feeling…The music, the Yiddish, these are the sounds of the Jewish life that my kids don't hear until they come here," said Andy Sos, who escorted his 2-year-old daughter.

This view was shared by Bill Emery, the JCC's executive director. Noting that this was the third year Ashkenaz had co-sponsored the Purim carnival, Emery said it adds a "whole different level.

"The emphasis now is on culture, which we were incapable of giving at that level [before Ashkenaz got involved]," he said.

Florence Moranz, the JCC program director, praised the work of the volunteers who contributed to the success of the event, among them B'nai Brith Youth Organization and the youth group of the First Narayever Congregation.

Life in Boston's high-speed lane

By SUSAN BERRIN

Guest Voices

On an airplane heading from Boston to Vancouver I reach for the Globe and Mail. This is my first trip back to Victoria since leaving in July.

These five hours of flying offer some time for reflection after nearly six months in the high-speed lane of Boston's Jewish community.

Erik Erikson and Gail Sheehy have both chronicled the passages of life, one poignant moment leading to the next one. I truly believe in life as a series of passages, a spiraling of stages, a confluence of moments which lead us – often without our prior understanding or permission – to new places.

This period of transition has been an interior as well as an exterior journey for me. Although we are essentially the same people – the same spirited, compassionate, serious individuals and family we were in Victoria six months ago – we are also different. That is what a journey is about: travelling new ground, absorbing new experiences and making them part of the fabric that is our new daily life.

The honeymoon is over. We have passed through that initial period of excitement when we unfurled our new lives, reacquainted ourselves with the Shabbat-lunch lineup, we have recounted the stories of our departure, of our house-hunting, of the transitions for each family member.

While I can say honestly I have no regrets about our move from Victoria, I have an enormous aching for that Garden of Eden. The pace in Boston, while at times exhilarating, is more often exhausting. Shabbat is the moment of rest, when demands of the world simply cease. It is a gift I hold dearly.

Our desire to return to Boston was based on the experience of our sabbatical year here: three children in Jewish day schools; two shul communities; possibilities to enrich our spiritual lives.

To the amazement of everyone, including ourselves, we've accomplished most of it. My work, as editor of Sh'ma, a monthly journal addressing the cutting edge issues for North American Jews, is challenging, stimulating and engaging Jewish work.

Victor misses the human exchange

Victor, who had been the rabbi of Victoria's only synagogue, is teaching and doing outreach for the Conservative movement. He misses the pulpit, the human exchange where on a daily basis he touched the lives of many, transforming the mundane into the profound.

Now that our children are in Jewish schools, we have a new view of the Jewish educational experience, and new questions to ask educators and administrators of Jewish learning.

While we are thrilled that our children are studying in a Jewish milieu, that they are learning Hebrew as naturally as English, questions arise, especially in terms of how Judaic subjects are taught in the upper grades. For example, how do we measure a relationship to the Bible or the impact of studying Jewish thought?

I've been saddened to see Jewish children turn away from limudei kodesh, the study of Jewish subjects, because the subjects are treated like general studies with grades and tests, and taught without passion.

It is also disheartening to witness the lack of kavanah, of intentional thought, children give to the morning prayer service in many Jewish schools. Who inspires them and challenges them to look into themselves and outwards at the larger world as they grow and develop Jewish identities?

Our three children, while content in their new schools, are stretched and overwhelmed with school work. Balancing this new dual curriculum is a daily (and due to homework, nightly) challenge.

One of my primary roles has become the encourager – each night assisting the children, rewarding their incremental gains and helping them see the whole picture – the Jewish in the Jewish school, the enormous strides they've made, their incidental accomplishments because the level of discouragement they feel is often immense.

Finding some balance will likely be the goal of this next stage in our acclimation. Some semblance of play in our work week, some light-hearted love in the classroom.

Susan Berrin has been sharing the experience of moving with her family from Victoria, B.C., to Newton, Mass.

Visiting Israeli teens meet their Canadian counterparts

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some two dozen 12th graders at Oakwood Collegiate Institute discovered unexpected similarities and differences when a pair of Israeli teens visited their class recently as part of an annual program run by Israel's foreign ministry.

"Do most people in Israel speak English as well as you guys?" asked one student in the twentieth century world history class, one of two classes they visited at the school.

Most Israelis finish high school with good English, said 17-year-old Herzliyah native Or Ellencweig, explaining that they learn the language from Grade 1.

"Also, we get all the [television] programs in English – Melrose Place, Dawson's Creek," said Yael Rosen of Kochav Yair.

"We're a season behind you," she added, prompting one student to offer an update.

Most surprising to the Canadian students was their Israeli counterparts' obligation to serve in the IDF after high school.

"How do you guys feel about that?" asked one girl.

Ellencweig, having grown up hearing army stories from his family, said he's "pretty much looking forward" to the experience. "It's difficult, but we have to do it and we realize that."

Today's IDF, now that the peace process is under way, isn't all about fighting, said Rosen, 16.

She and Ellencweig are among 74 Israeli youth delegates meeting with their peers in dozens of communities in Europe, North and South America, Africa, the Far East, Russia, Australia and New Zealand.

The pair's month-long visit to Canada, which began Feb. 21, includes stops in Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Calgary, Vancouver, Montreal and the Maritimes.

Their presentation at Oakwood included a video on Israel, and a talk by Rosen and Ellencweig touching on Israel's geography, climate, history and political situation.

Youth in Israel are very politically involved, said Ellencweig. He is a member of a right-wing youth movement, he said. "We go to demonstrations and give flyers."

Both right- and left-wingers want peace, said Rosen, whose views are left of centre. "There's just a difference of opinion as to how we should achieve it."

The right wing believes that security in Israel will "lead to a good peace treaty that will last for decades," said Ellencweig.

The left is more willing to trade land for peace, and believes that once there is peace, security will follow, explained Rosen.

Israeli teens Or Ellencweig, left, and Yael Rosen discussed everything from night-life to army life when they visited students at Oakwood Collegiate Institute. [Frances Kraft photo]

"How do you feel about the future of Jewish-Arab relations?" asked a student.

"I think there will be peace eventually, because both sides want it so much," said Rosen. "The problem is, the issues being discussed now are so important to each side, so I think it will take a little longer."

At least one student was shocked to hear that Israelis attend school six days a week. "Oh my God!" she said.

"What do you do for fun?" asked another.

Ellencweig told the class about Friday nights at Tel Aviv clubs and discotheques. "We listen to the same music," he said.

"It was good to have kids talk to us," one youngster told The CJN at the end of class. "You can relate to them more."

Richmond Hill congregation enjoying strong growth

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

RICHMOND HILL — In few places is York Region's Jewish explosion better reflected than at Beit Rayim Synagogue.

The Conservative congregation has experienced two consecutive years of 30 percent annual growth, bringing its membership to about 210 families – and it is still expanding.

The fully egalitarian Richmond Hill shul at Bayview and Weldrick avenues boasts adult education classes, youth programs, a family choir, a women's group and over 20 committees. Housed in the northernmost campus of United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS), which now owns both the campus and the synagogue building, its sanctuary is regularly packed to capacity, and life cycle ceremonies take place regularly.

Prof. Sol Tanenzapf of York University is the rabbi, and Eli Bard is the lay cantor. Some 170 children are enrolled in the Beit Rayim Hebrew school. Programs like Davening for Dummies and a full array of youth activities for Yeladim, Kadima and USY age groups have won the synagogue several gold Solomon Schecter Awards from the Conservative movement.

Dr. Irving Siegel is president of Beit Rayim Synagogue.

Beit Rayim rose from the ashes of the former Shaarei Haim Congregation, which became the first synagogue in Canada to go broke.

Shaarei Haim closed its doors to its 310 families in June 1992, after it ran out of operating funds and the bank refused to extend further credit. Many feared the closing would leave a void, as the nearest Conservative synagogue was Shaar Shalom, several kilometres south near Steeles Avenue and Don Mills Road.

But in 1993, about 60 families who had been members of Shaarei Haim formed Beit Rayim (literally, House of Friends) to satisfy the need for an egalitarian Conservative synagogue in mid-York Region.

So successful has Beit Rayim become that it's already outgrown its quarters. The congregation is in the second phase of a fundraising campaign geared to finding a free-standing, permanent building in the area. Shul president Dr. Irving Siegel says about $200,000 has been raised so far.

"It's really amazing when you consider how shaky our beginnings were," Siegel told The CJN. "But there's no turning back now. We're optimistic we'll have a permanent home in York Region."

That region is the fastest growing Jewish community in Canada. Now 50,000-strong, officials estimate it will balloon to 75,000, a 50 percent jump, in just 10 years. Community planners are giving thought to a Lipa Green Building/Bathurst Jewish Centre-style "campus" for York Region, pulling several services and programs under one roof.

Late last year, Cliff Hendler, a Thornhill resident, put out feelers for a new Conservative synagogue in the area bounded by Dufferin Street, Steeles Avenue, Yonge Street and Highway 7. Jews represent nearly one-third of the population in the area, and the response was strong.

Siegel said Beit Rayim has been "in touch" with Hendler.

Beit Rayim can be reached at 905-770-7639, or on the Web at www.beitrayim.org.

Kosher butcher shop celebrates 45th anniversary

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Herman Perl came to Canada in 1950 with nothing.

Now, the company he founded, H. Perl Products, is one of the major Canadian suppliers of kosher deli products.

On March 8, Perl celebrated the business' 45th anniversary by giving out free hot dogs at his new restaurant, Bais Burger, at Bathurst and Caribou, selling chicken for 99 cents a pound, and offering 10 per- cent off most meat.

Born in Transylvania, Romania, Perl spent the war years in Esperachen concentration camp. When he was liberated, he went to Brussels, where he worked as a diamond cleaver.

In Toronto, he had trouble settling in a job, because he insisted on remaining shomer Shabbat. Finally, in 1954, he opened a small kosher butcher shop at Bloor and Euclid.

"I didn't know about being a butcher. I had one worker who said I would go broke if I kept on paying him. So he taught me how to do it, and I used to spend the day in the store, and in the early morning and in the evening, I would deliver."

In 1962, he moved up to his present location at Bathurst and Lawrence. Perls now occupies 3011, 3013 and 3015 Bathurst St. Bais Burger, a small restaurant, opened in February. There is also a branch of Perls in the Promenade Village Shops in Thornhill.

Perl is proud of his accomplishments. He was the first in Ontario to sell meat and chicken already kashered (soaked and salted), the first to sell cut-up chickens, and the first to have self-service, prepackaged meat.

"It was very tough at first," he said, because consumers weren't used to such services. But he persevered, and his ideas are now universally used in the Toronto markets. "I modernized kosher meat shopping," he said.

He firmly believes that "if meat was still sold the old-fashioned way, 80 percent of young people wouldn't keep kosher today," because of the time consuming process of eviscerating and cutting up chicken, and soaking, salting and rinsing meat and poultry.

He began selling prepared foods in the late 1960s. "I used to make three dozen knishes and two dozen kreplach" and that was that. Now, he makes a wide variety of foods, from egg rolls, to chicken dishes to stir fry. His salamis, wieners and deli products are sold, not only in his own store, but in various supermarkets.

Customers' needs and wants are different from the early days of the business, Perl said. "Then, we couldn't sell expensive meats – only chucks. Now, we mainly grind chuck."

He said that people have more money now and so eat better, more roasts and steaks, for example.

Another difference is that people are buying more chicken than red meat. "Chicken is cheaper and easier to prepare. Besides, people are concerned about cholesterol, even though that isn't really such a problem with lean meat. But beef is mainly for company, yom tov, and Shabbes."

Constantly on the lookout for the innovative, at one point Perl even tried to sell venison. "I made arrangements with a farmer, and packaged and froze some. But no one bought it. I guess you really have to know the proper way to cook it."

The latest endeavor is Bais Burger. Perl said that he opened it because he was concerned about the many youngsters in the area who needed kosher food that was not too expensive. Bais Burger offers a limited menu, french fries and hot dogs for 99 cents, and hamburgers for $1.99.

In 1956, Perl married Esther Langner, the granddaughter of the Strettiner Rebbe, one of the very few chassidic rebbes to have a court in Toronto. They have six children (two work in the business with him) and 25 grandchildren.

School emphasizes Yiddish culture, social justice

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Early on a Sunday afternoon a group of 10 children bustle around the kitchen of the Winchevsky Centre.

Some hover around the stove putting the final touches on the chicken soup while others are gathered at the counter making cookies. One child pours cinnamon and vanilla into a decorated box and encourages her classmates to take a whiff of the spice box.

This particular week it's Shabbat on Sunday at the Morris Winchevsky Community School. As part of their studies on the Sabbath, the students of the Grade 7 class, the b'nai mitzvah, are preparing a traditional Shabbat dinner for their families and friends.

They have also invited senior members of United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), a progressive secular Jewish organization that has provided a Jewish educational program through the Morris Winchevsky School for more than 70 years.

The school, or shule as it is called by its students, has traditionally placed a strong emphasis on the teaching of Yiddish and Yiddish culture, rather than Hebrew and Jewish liturgy, says school administrator and UJPO executive director, Maxine Hermolin, who's there for the Shabbat festivities.

She notes that during the formative years of the school some of Toronto's foremost Yiddishists – Mania Lifshitz, Nechama Yanovsky and Label Basman – taught there, but by the '90s, formal Yiddish language studies had lapsed.

The formal study of Yiddish was resumed and the students also began learning some Hebrew last year, she says.

This supplementary education program provides some 70 students from kindergarten to Grade 7 with the opportunity to learn about Jewish heritage and traditions, within a secular humanistic framework, through a curriculum that emphasizes Jewish history and holidays, Yiddish language and literature, and social justice issues, Hermolin says.

Learning is enhanced by creative activities such as dance, song and drama, she adds.

The b'nai mitzvah class follows a program which culminates in a formal graduation, she says.

The students work on individual and group projects connected to Jewish themes, which they present at the graduation or bar mitzvah ceremony, where the group celebrates this life cycle event together, Hermolin explains.

In the kitchen, her words are echoed by Elisha Wagman, the teacher of the b'nai mitzvah. She stresses that the graduation ceremony is a cooperative effort: the students are "dependent on each other" for its success.

Wagman enthuses about her students' projects – they've chosen to do films – noting that one group plans on making a dramatic film about the Warsaw Ghetto, while the other will do a film on Jewish food. The projects are to be filmed by York University film students.

Wagman says she's pleased with the social justice projects carried out by the class, including creating a new poster for the Humane Society and giving financial support to the Shalom Food Project. They have planned to have a ribbon sale at the next major shule event to raise money for, and awareness of, child abuse.

Wagman turns her attention to the last details of the Shabbat dinner as family and friends file into the social hall, seating themselves at the festively decorated tables.

The children recite UJPO sayings as the Shabbat candles are lit, wine is sipped and home-made challah is passed round to all the guests.

Seated together, UJPO stalwarts Molly Myers, Izzie Fine, Helen Ura and Eva Lidsky, take part in the Shabbat meal.

"It's an effort to come, but I made it," says Myers, a young-at-heart octogenarian. "This is something that's important."

She stresses that after spending 54 years in UJPO, she believes that passing on the ideals to the younger generations and supporting them in their endeavors is crucial to preserving the organization.

Creating the Jewish future

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Commentary

Since the closure of the Bible, prophecy has been given to fools and infants. So teach our Talmudic sages. Yet many of us – some wise, some understanding, some learned in the Torah – periodically peek around the corner, to imagine the future, to speculate about what will occur, and to articulate a vision of what should be.

During the past 50 years, the concerns of the Jewish community grew from an agenda of civic freedom and economic integration to a concern with Jewish defence and advocacy. Emboldened by the establishment of the State of Israel, and with full recognition of the horrors of the Holocaust, we became public advocates for Israeli security and economic development, as well as for freedom for oppressed Jews throughout the world. Our "civil religion" became ethnic consciousness, Holocaust awareness and support of Israel.

Recent studies by Steven Cohen for the Jewish Community Centres Association indicate that many ethnic patterns – friendship and social associations, residential neighborhoods and concern for Israel – which formerly linked Jews, have atrophied.

In contrast, commitments which we associate with religious practice remain steady. Many concerned Jews have come to realize that assimilation can be limited only by renewing the Jewish soul through conscious Jewish practice, prayer and study. In keeping with a general cultural trend, people are desirous of a spiritual path which will enrich their personal lives.

Steven Bayme of the American Jewish Committee and Jack Wertheimer of the Jewish Theological Seminary have argued for targeting the majority of communal funds and programs toward those Jews who already demonstrate an interest in Jewish life, rather than those Jews who are less involved in our community. They call for a system of communal triage to strengthen those programs which already reach large numbers of Jews, and can be upgraded by better planning and an influx of communal funds.

Some of the programs which work well and deserve greater support, are synagogues, family education programs, day schools, summer camps and Israel experiences. While I agree with the need to support the broad middle of the community, we must also recognize that so-called "marginal" or "peripheral" Jews may surprise us by what they can bring to our community both in the short and long term.

For the foreseeable future, synagogues will remain the primary gateways for those seeking entry to and a deepening involvement with Jewish life.

Synagogues must be strengthened to enable them to serve this purpose. Day care and early childhood education programs, congregational schools, bar/bat mitzvah celebrations and high school youth programs remain among the most wide-spread ways our community can intersect with young Jews and their families. While these have been part of synagogue educational ventures, they require an infusion of creative programming, and the development of linkages to other communal activities.

To enable synagogues to develop new and creative programs which will attract and hold young Jews, we must be willing to invest in them.

Federations and private foundations must revise their conceptions of synagogues to conform to reality. Rather than see synagogues as semi-private entities serving their members, they should recognize that synagogues are public, communal institutions which are open to all. They provide for daily, Shabbat and festival prayer, adult education and pastoral counselling, and offer dues abatement and school bursaries to enable families and students, regardless of their financial status, to participate in the life of the congregation.

However, synagogues, supported by membership dues and sporadic fundraising efforts, are woefully under-funded and understaffed to serve the many people who might benefit from their array of programs and services.

I am an advocate for intensive Jewish education. I believe that day schools provide a holistic framework for education, which best integrates diverse aspects of Jewish life. The greatest success of day schools lies in skill building and intellectual knowledge.

The development of enduring commitment among day school students appears to be dependent on the duration of the experience through high school and on the correlation of family values with the orientation of the school. That is, day school students who continue their education through their teen years have a higher level of adult Jewish involvement than those who end their education after elementary school.

Recognizing this, a group of private donors has recently begun to fund efforts to seed new Jewish high schools. In addition, we know that young people who accompany their parents to synagogue and who practice Judaism in the home have a much higher level of commitment than those adolescents who merely receive an academic education.

Despite the growing enrolment in day schools throughout North America and the high percentage of Canadian youth who receive a day school education, congregational Hebrew schools have served and will continue to serve the vast majority of North American Jews. Congregational Hebrew schools have an important future as part of a mix of Jewish educational opportunities.

We should realize that after-school programs actually mirror the experiences of most adult Jews whose Jewish involvement tends to be either early in the morning, after work or on weekends. These afternoon and weekend schools face many challenges. They occur at a difficult time of day, are staffed by undertrained or overworked teachers, have insufficient resources, and despite their voluntary nature, reveal low motivation by students and families. Nonetheless, we have some models for successful programs, and must apply these "best practices" to a wider audience.

One of the primary problems of the congregational school, is a disconnection between the priorities of the program and those of the home. However, schools which have been able to build bridges between the classroom and the family do experience success.

The Downtown Hebrew School, Temple Sinai, Holy Blossom and Beth Tzedec are among the strongest local practitioners of family education. During the past few years, the Toronto Jewish Federation and Board of Jewish Education have brought training and financial resources to the area of family education. The schools which meet their qualifying standards will receive funding to develop new programs to involve the family.

As parental support is developed for the goals of the congregational school, students receive the clear message that their families value the after-school program. This is one of the critical markers of successful schools.

In addition, schools which carefully define their expectations, for example in Hebrew language study, are more likely to enable students to achieve basic competency in this or other areas of study.

Funding for staff development, for the recruitment and training of qualified retirees or other individuals, and

Youth groups, Israel critical for Jewish identity

for participation in cutting edge conferences such as those of the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education or the Whizzen Institute for Family Education of the University of Judaism, also help to build teacher competency and morale. We need communal funding to assist these afternoon Hebrew schools to maintain standards for their programs, develop new and creative ways to teach skills, information and ideas and expand Jewish social opportunities for their students.

Congregational schools should be seen as essential to the broad spectrum of educational opportunities available in a community.

Youth groups and summer experiences in camp and Israel are critical to the development of Jewish identity. Educational research has begun to confirm the importance of these informal educational opportunities for young people. Recent research suggests that personal transformational experiences cannot be formally planned. However, their impact on the development of adult Jewish identity is quite significant.

Communities need to develop and support frameworks within which those affective opportunities can occur.

Synagogues and schools can be encouraged to work together with federations and other Jewish agencies to foster memorable peak experiences for youth with Shabbatonim (weekend retreats) and trips which build group solidarity and shared memories. With proper communal support, they can develop incentives for their children to attend Jewish camps and join summer programs based in Israel.

In the context of those programs, young people and their prospective role models have the time and opportunity to generate the unplanned "teachable moments" which transform lives. When these types of experiences are linked to ongoing synagogue and school programs, they create the possibility of continuity, even after the spiritual and psychological "high" has passed.

There has been an explosion of opportunities for adults to study Torah. We have benefited from independent and synagogue-based classes such as the ones available at Beth Tzedec. Learner's Shabbat services and other "walk in" programs have made Jewish study more accessible. We have learned that small scale seminars provide people with an exciting engagement with traditional Jewish texts.

One of the major sources of new energy in our community comes from adults who do not take the Jewish experience for granted. Converts to Judaism bring interest and involvement to Jewish life. Often, they see the moral grandeur and spiritual richness that born Jews take for granted. They demonstrate to Jews that our tradition is enriching and encourage Jews by birth to take a closer look at their own tradition.

In all streams of Judaism, women are seeking greater involvement. For some, it is inclusion in public worship, often taking the form of an adult bat mitzvah. For others, it is increased opportunity to study traditional texts at an advanced level. As women deepen their skills and knowledge, they stimulate men to also do so.

We are also seeking a new interest in programs of healing, seeking to bring to bear the resources of the Jewish tradition to the personal struggles so many face as they deal with debilitating illnesses.

A generation after the founding of Israel, this small country has evolved from a "miracle" to a complex real nation. Still, the intensity of the various expressions of Jewish life in Israel can serve to heighten awareness and involvement of young Jews from the Diaspora. The increased attention to what is being termed the "Israel Experience" and the newly announced "Birthright" program to enable all Jewish youth between the ages of 16 and 25 to visit Israel are expressive of the importance Jewry attaches to Israel, and a recognition of the profound impact a peer visit to Israel can have.

However, such trips, if they occur in splendid isolation from other "home based" Jewish experiences, will have little long term effect. Combined with significant educational preparation and/or followed by communal service, the impact of the trip will be magnified and a deeper connection to Jewish life developed.

I have no doubt that Judaism has a future. The type of future will depend on our choices. As we search for a paradigm to guide and direct Jewish life, we return to core elements from an older model: Torah study, prayer, family life, concern for Israel, and acts of tzedakah. These building blocks will be framed and expressed in a new way, as each generation has done in the past.

Rather than a wholesale reworking of existing communal structures, we should seek to improve those which continue to be effective – synagogues, camps, schools, youth programs and families – to meet the needs and yearnings of the 21st century.

Culminating all this discussion of structures, institutions and programs, we must always realize that life is with people. Personal contact and passionate conviction remain the keys to the Jewish future. We must speak with the language of care and concern for our fellow Jews, out of the commitment that a life linked to Torah matters to the individual and to God.

Calgary, Atlantic provinces host Jewish students

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At each end of the country, a week apart, Jewish student groups gathered for their annual conferences.

The Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student Federation's (APJSF) annual RISE conference and ski trip took place February 5 to 7, and the Calgary Hillel conference called From Stern to Seinfeld: Jews in the Media was held February 12 to 15.

According to Yakov Feig, director of the APJSF, the RISE conference has always been held, "in some form," for at least seven years.

The conference, which takes place at Cape Smokey, in Cape Breton, attracted students from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

This year, Michael Soberman and Susan Jackson from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto addressed the group. Soberman spoke about the uniqueness of the "Israel experience," and how Israeli cultural differences can often come as a surprise to North Americans.

As a part of Jackson's session, Schmoozing with Susan, she commented on how often Jewish customs are handed down, often out of respect for older generations.

Rabbi Benjie Jacoby, from Toronto, performed the havdalah service, getting students to sing spiritual songs in parts and in unison. Candles were placed in the middle of the room, and the group held arm-in-arm in a swaying circle, in rhythm to the blessings made by Rabbi Jacoby.

Saturday night provided time for the students to enjoy the music of Dave Berger, a Jewish folk singer from Nova Scotia, who entertained the group with songs from his latest CD.

Calgary Hillel's conference, according to Vered Koren, one of the student organizers, "focused on issues that affect young Jewish lives." The western Jewish student conferences have also been running for at least six years.

This year's conference involved sessions such as analysing anti-Israel and controversial anti-Semitic advertisements and editorial cartoons, discussing the differences between Jewish culture and Jewish faith, and a mock up of a famous game show called Jewpardy.

The purpose of these workshops, says Koren, were to, "provoke thought...see how the media affects our lives, to see different perspectives and opinions, and not to make the assumption that everyone is the same kind of Jewish."

Appropriately, the media conference in Calgary offered students an opportunity to see a film, Life is Beautiful, which elicited mixed reactions from the group, from being an important commentary, to another student's feeling that humor within the context of the Holocaust was inappropriate.

The conference concluded with a trip to Banff, where students spent the day skiing.

The best part of the Calgary conference, according to Koren, was the, "chance for [the students] to meet other Jewish students from outside of their area...everyone's there to bond."

Jonathan Waldman, a participant from Winnipeg, and editor of the Jewish Student Association News Bulletin, had said that the best part for him was, "examining certain [editorial] images that opened my eyes to some tough journalistic ethical questions."

Waldman, who had attended for the first time this year, also believes that one of the highlights was meeting people. "I think for most people, myself included, one of the best parts was seeing old friends – people I haven't seen in a while."

Sharansky predicts large Russian aliyah

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Natan Sharansky says he'll run for prime minister if another million Jews emigrate from the former Soviet Union (FSU). And he's only half joking.

That's what he told a gathering of 1,000 Jews during his trip to Moscow last month.

"They know everything that's happening in Israel. They asked, 'Why are you not a candidate for prime minister?' I said, if one more million Jews come, I'll run. It all depends on you," Sharansky, now industry and trade minister and leader of Yisrael b'Aliyah, a party advocating the interests of immigrants, said in an interview.

Sharansky was in Montreal on a brief private visit, his first time here since 1987. He was accompanying his wife Avital, who spoke at a Women of Lubavitch event.

Sharansky is certain Israel is about to receive another major wave of Russian Jewish olim, swelling the ranks of the million already settled. "Over the next year, it could easily reach 40,000, and possibly 60,000 or more."

Sharansky's party now holds seven seats in the Knesset, and received 40 percent of the vote among Russian immigrants. He is confident he can increase that to nine seats in this May's election.

"We will use all our influence to encourage the leaders of the [Labor and Likud] parties to form a national unity government," he said, because it is the best way to heal the divisions among Israelis. "In particular, the problem between Orthodox and non-Orthodox will only be solved by broad consensus, not one side imposing itself through legislation or the Supreme Court.

Sharansky, 51, the best-known leader of the Refusenik movement in the 1970s, who spent nine years in Soviet prisons on charges of espionage for the CIA, has been in Israel since his release in 1986. He was first elected to the Knesset in 1996.

"It's the first time in three years that I see a very clear rise in interest in making aliyah," he said. That is due to the political and economic instability, and fears of anti-Semitism. This was his fifth trip to Russia since January 1997.

Saw KGB files

Sharansky said he was pleasantly surprised by the response he received when he raised the issue of anti-Semitism with Vladimir Putin, head of the KGB's main successor, the Federal Security Bureau. Sharansky said he feared Jews will be made scapegoats for the country's ill, not officially by the state, but among nationalist forces.

"I was expecting him to say nonsense, it's nothing like that. I was surprised that his answer was 'we are taking the situation very seriously at the top level, and we will react in a very tough way and immediately.'"

The fact that Jews in the FSU are now free to know what is going on in Israel is another factor favoring their immigration, he said. They are aware that their predecessors have become an integral part of the country, including at the political level. "They feel that they can be an active participant in their own absorption," he said.

A highlight of his Moscow trip was being permitted, for the first time, to see the files the KGB kept concerning his dissident activities – 15,000 documents in 52 volumes, the work of 18 investigators.

Sharansky could not resist the urge to gloat a bit. "Here I was sitting in the [former] room of [Yuri] Andropov (then the KGB head), who signed my arrest papers, and I was saying to them give me this book, or make me a copy of that and they were doing it...It was a feeling of triumph. It was a scene appropriate for the week of Purim."

He recalled that after his 1977 arrest, a KGB interrogator showed him a tape of a demonstration abroad on his behalf, in front of a Soviet embassy. The interrogator had suggested to him that he was deluding himself if he thought mere "students and housewives" could help him.

"An army of housewives and students fought day after day. The result is they not only defeated the KGB, but one million Jews emigrated to Israel and the Soviet Union is history," he said.

Sharansky said he found the names of several Canadians in the files, including Irwin Cotler, who acted as his attorney, and members of the Group of 35, a women's organization for Soviet Jewish emigration.

Personally, he says he feels pity for the people of the FSU, but he does not underestimate the country's resilience. "Nobody should have any illusions. In 10 to 15 years, it will return to a super-power. How close it will be to a democracy is not certain. The West should be much more involved in its development."

Sharansky would like to further develop Israel's trade with Russia, a natural partner because of the one million Russians in Israel. Currently, trade is worth about $300 to $400 million, about the same as that with Romania.

Sharansky made a surprise appearance at the Women of Lubavitch event, which is normally for women only.

He related that he had once shared a prison cell with a top official, jailed for bribery. The official told him many of the Soviet elite had Jewish wives.

"He said he knew it was not accidental, that a Zionist organization had a plot to penetrate the country and destroy it from within...He said he even knew the name of the organization.

"He whispered in my ear 'Hadassah.' That's when I found out about the big power of Jewish women."

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

"Shlemiels" is the way one seasoned, non-Jewish political hack characterized the recent United Alternative convention in Ottawa. He was referring to the decision reached by the delegates to form a new political party – ostensibly, to replace the current right-wing offerings.

By not supporting the option championed by Hal Jackman (and privately endorsed by Tory leader Joe Clark) to coordinate candidates at the local riding level, the convention doomed the conservative forces of Canada to another long chapter in opposition. In the next election, the Reform Party will again compete against the Tories rather than direct all of its energies at unseating the Natural Governing Party (a.k.a., the Liberals).

When he offered the comment "shlemiels," our friend was confident that no one around us would understand or appreciate the remark. He was right, but that got us to musing about the absence of any real Jewish presence at the convention.

Reform's failure to attract Jews to its ranks has been a source of great frustration to the party's political leadership. Preston Manning has reached out to the Jewish community on numerous occasions and has held frequent meetings with Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith. Despite these efforts, Reform continues to be viewed with suspicion.

In part, this can be attributed to the chronic tendency among Reform MPs to put their feet in their mouths. At one meeting with CJC, congress representatives were appalled at some of the comments made by Reform caucus members concerning the prosecution of Nazi war criminals in Canada. Comments on Israel also betray a tenuous grasp of the issues.

The problem, of course, is that for many Jews, it is the party itself that is offensive. Separate from the fact that Jews have traditionally felt more at home with political parties that are viewed as small 'l' liberal, they are apprehensive about the right wing, moral majority-like, Christian agenda that laces Reform's social policies. There is a sense that while Preston Manning and Deborah Grey may be tolerant, their cause is a magnet for views that are less so. At the United Alternative convention, social policy debate was purposely suppressed. Perhaps Jews and other minorities would feel less uncomfortable and more welcome when concern for social issues features more prominently on the Reform agenda.

Distributors cash in on national Crazy Bones craze

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Children are crazy for Crazy Bones, one of the hottest selling toys in Canada.

Crazy Bones, small plastic pieces with cartoon character-like features used to play a game similar to marbles or alleys, are a hit with children between the ages of five and 12.

And that's good news for All 4 Fun Toy Products Ltd., the company with the Canadian rights for this popular toy.

Eric Segal, 33, and Wayne Fromm, 44, co-presidents of All 4 Fun said they can't keep up with the demand for the bones, which are manufactured in Mexico. As soon as a shipment of bones arrive at the warehouse, they're immediately shipped off to the stores, among them, Toys R Us, Zellers, and many independent dollar and toy stores.

They noted that Crazy Bones made $300 million (US) in European sales after it was introduced there in 1996, and predicted that with the crazy bone craze sweeping the country, sales in Canada could reach the $20 million mark.

While there are many comparisons between crazy bones and pogs, a toy fad that lasted several months in the mid-90s, Fromm was quick to point out the differences. He said pogs, round cardboard pieces, were easy to emulate, and thus never became collector items.

He stressed that Crazy Bones, which are released in limited editions, are modeled after the successful Beanie Babies, the popular stuffed animals with names and characters, that have become hot collector items.

Eric Segal and Wayne Fromm of All 4 Fun.

Crazy Bones – they retail for about $2 for a package of three – are also collected and traded. So far, two series, each with 40 characters, all with names and available in 15 colors, have been issued. The company is now launching Series 3, which will be introduced March 16 to 21 at the SkyDome's Spring Fling.

Fromm said there will be giveaways and Crazy Bone tournaments at the SkyDome, with all proceeds from the sale of Series 3 at that venue going to the Starlight Children's Foundation of Canada.

Other plans for this popular toy include a Crazy Bones Go Go return top or yo-yo style toy; Crazy Bones party kits, candy, licensed clothing, a CD-ROM and possibly an animated television show, Fromm said. "We're creating a brand."

A toy inventor who designs products for toy giants like Crayola, Irwin and Mattel, Fromm became a partner in Crazy Bones in December, a year and a half after a chance meeting with one of Segal's employees.

Segal's involvement with this toy, which began at the end of 1996, was also serendipitous. Friends of his in-laws, who own a packaging plant, happened to have the Canadian rights to the product.

He said they approached him – he has a background in toy marketing, and plastic moulding production – about acquiring the product, after they were turned down by many of the larger Canadian toy companies.

"They (the toy companies) couldn't envision the product," Segal said. "At that time it was presented in a raw form foil pack...It did well in Spain and Europe, Mexico and Latin America. Toy companies weren't prepared to risk it."

He said those companies didn't know if Crazy Bones would work in North America where kids were accustomed to playing with "high-end high-tech items," but he "saw the opportunity."

Segal set up a company headquartered at home. The garage was his warehouse for the product, then imported from Spain.

Through his previous contacts in toy sales, he was able to place the product in Toys R Us and Zellers, setting up video displays on the store shelves.

He also did "gorilla marketing" to conduct market research, which is setting up demonstrations at schools and fun fairs, and he ran a demo tent outside the Toys R Us in Newmarket, handing out fliers and free samples.

With the success of sales, Segal was able to license his product to a larger, more established toy company. At the time Fromm did not get involved because the project was too speculative, he said. However, Play Toy Industries licensed the Crazy Bones, spending close to $1 million to promote the product.

Crazy Bones in Canada took off in the fall of 1998, Segal said. He Novel addresses Mideast issues

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Peter Ginsberg, a 44-year-old Israeli army veteran, has written a newly published novel which, he hopes, will serve as a kind of bridge between Jews and Arabs.

The Middle East is trapped in a "war culture," said Ginsberg, the author of Katifa. But if Israeli Jews and Palestinian Arabs are ever to move from war to peace, they will have to change their attitudes.

The Oslo peace accords were supposed to end the Arab-Israeli dispute, yet both sides still regard the other as enemies rather than partners and friends.

"This book is supposed to be a bridge to bring both sides together by changing the way they think about each other. The Arabs are not Nazis and the Jews are not in the Warsaw ghetto."

Katifa, set in 2018, is a politically tinged romance which unfolds against the backdrop of a civil war which rips apart a Palestinian state. Israel remains neutral, but opens its borders to Arab refugees.

In a refugee camp under Israeli control and United Nations administration, Danny Levinsky – a shy, kind and hopelessly romantic Israeli soldier originally from Canada – falls in love with one of the refugees, Katifa Mansour, a beautiful, headstrong lieutenant in the Palestinian army.

Their budding, seemingly dysfunctional romance provokes heated discussions. How can a Jew possibly date, much less marry, a Palestinian? Danny's friends and Katifa's commander both agree that they must sever the relationship. Even Katifa has doubts. She wonders whether Danny is not really a Mossad agent trying to turn her against her people.

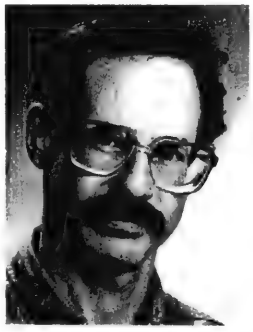
Published by Jam Ink Publishing in Kincardine, Ont., in cooperation with Ages Publications in Los Angeles, Katifa is "speculative" in terms of plot, events and characters.

But, as Ginsberg pointed out, there are important elements of truth in Katifa, which is carried by the Indigo book store chain.

"A writer is like his characters," he said. "There's a little bit of me in all of them."

In addition, Ginsberg drew on historical parallels. In 1971, following the civil war in Jordan, a small number of Palestinians fleeing Jordanian retribution streamed into Israel. And during the early phase of Lebanon's civil war, the Israeli government opened the Good Fence on the Lebanese frontier to allow Lebanese civilians to take jobs in Israel.

Ginsberg, a mechanical engineer who wrote Katifa over a six-month period, was inspired by personal experiences as well. He lived in Israel between 1972 to 1978 and was a private in the Israeli army from 1974 to 1977. Furthermore, his wife Cathy, the mother of his three children, is a Christian convert to Judaism. They live in Holland Landing, near Newmarket. At one juncture, he was president of Newmarket's Or Chadash synagogue.



Peter Ginsberg

Born in Montreal, the son of the late Hyman and Adele Ginsberg, Ginsberg was raised by his grandmother, Asna. As a teenager, he was a member of the Hashomer Hazair Zionist youth group. After graduating from West Hill High School, he went to Israel to study at the Hebrew University's special program for overseas students.

He joined the Israeli army to integrate himself into Israeli society. "I decided that if I was serious about staying in Israel, I would have to do what Israelis my age were doing. And so, in the summer of 1973, I volunteered for the army."

Drafted after the Yom Kippur War, Ginsberg was never in combat. He was in an infantry regiment and then in an armored formation as a tank gunner. He served in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Sinai Peninsula, but also along Israel's border with Lebanon.

As he suggests in Katifa – a novel with appropriately steamy segments and deliberately profane language – the basic training regimen was psychologically stressful and physically brutal. Indeed, he was almost broken by it. In boot camp, however, he learned idiomatic Hebrew. The army, meanwhile, taught him much about himself and Israeli society.

After being demobilized, he lived for a while on Kibbutz Rivadim, but returned to Canada in 1978. He missed the four seasons. He was disappointed by kibbutz life. He was repelled by the "basic hatreds" held by some Israelis about Arabs.

Ginsberg believes that Israel has no viable alternative to the Oslo peace process. He is convinced that Israel, in its own best interests, should support the establishment of a Palestinian state. However, he allows for the possibility that it might be unstable.

Ginsberg, who spends from one to four hours a day on his writing, is completing another novel. The working title is The War of the Fairies, and it is not about the Middle East.

Top brass disagree on best strategy for Syria

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

When the subject is South Lebanon, all the politicians and top brass in Israel are essentially making two statements: Israel wants to pull out of Lebanon, and Damascus holds the key to the South Lebanese question. But they don't all give the same meaning to the two statements – especially the one concerning Damascus.

Former defence minister Yitzhak Mordechai and his successor, Moshe Arens, apparently have different views, possibly indicating a policy change on the connection between Syria and the Lebanese issue. The substantial difference between the two camps is whether the key held by Damascus is diplomatic or military.

If the approach is that a solution lies only in comprehensive negotiations with Damascus or that no deal concerning Lebanon can be made without approval from Damascus, the key is defined in terms of the peace process.

This is the approach favored by Mordechai, who did not allow the fighting against Hezbollah to develop into a military confrontation with Syria. It is also the view favored by Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz, who maintains that as long as there is a chance of peace talks with Syria, a military confrontation should be avoided, unless the government decides otherwise.

There are those with a different perspective. Arens is one of them. They believe that since Syria backs Hezbollah and is in a position to stop the activities of an organization that is killing and injuring Israelis, the key held by Damascus is military. According to this analysis, Damascus has no strategic or military aces up its sleeve, but does know how to effectively utilize the few good cards it holds against Israel, in view of our weak position.

Thus, Syria must be told categorically that it is risking war with Israel because no one can expect any responsible country to stand by and let its civilian population be shelled while continuing a "business as usual" attitude toward those providing the technical assistance facilitating the shelling.

Not surprisingly, most of the "key military" proponents oppose any link between the South Lebanese question and comprehensive peace talks with Syria because they support the existence of two separate negotiating tracks.

This is the view of both Arens and Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon. Although one must not construe that Arens and the other "key military" proponents advocate a military confrontation with Syria, they are certainly willing to take more chances than Mordechai did, as could be seen in his policy on Syrian troops in Lebanon.

This was demonstrated in the bombing of Hezbollah targets in the heart of Ba'albek, which is located in territory under direct Syrian control. They do not want war with Syria, but a wider conflict could obviously develop if the situation gets out of control.

Syria is creating the impression that it is not interested in a military confrontation with Israel. It will carry on supporting Hezbollah operations in Southern Lebanon but will act cautiously and will continue to monitor Israel's "sensitivity threshold" to avoid the eruption of a military conflict.

This is a sophisticated approach, shared by Hezbollah. After inflicting casualties and physical damage on Israel, the organization will keep a lid on its activities, but after a "cooling-down" period it will resume its attacks on Israel.

Nonetheless, Israel should exercise care when assessing a possible Syrian reaction to its operations. If the Syrians sustain a direct hit, they might not retaliate with a direct military response. It should, however, be pointed out that Syrian anti-aircraft missile batteries have been positioned close to the Lebanese border, and that they effectively cover the Lebanese valley, the scene of considerable Israeli Air Force activity.

The Syrians could respond indirectly, for example, by increasing its support of Hamas (which is precisely what Damascus has begun doing) so that this organization can step up its terrorist attacks on Israel. Syria could also disrupt Israel's relations with the Palestinian Authority or Jordan, or could upgrade its joint operations with Iran and even Iraq.

Those considering forcing Damascus into a corner in Lebanon, must take into account the entire range of possible Syrian responses. Even if the Syrians' position appears to have weakened, they can still cause a considerable amount of strategic damage. Given the make-up of the present government, the chief of staff's stature has suddenly assumed greater importance. Mofaz must exercise greater caution and self-restraint than the members of the security cabinet. Indeed, that is precisely the kind of behavior the Israeli public is expecting from him.

Arafat to ask U.S. to back statehood

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat is expected to ask President Bill Clinton to formally support the Palestinian right to establish an independent state when the two leaders meet in Washington on March 23.

Recognition of the right to statehood by the United States, which was favored by First Lady Hillary Clinton last year, could become part of a broad international effort to convince the Palestinians to postpone a unilateral declaration of independence beyond May 4, the deadline for final status set in the Oslo accords.

The Palestinians are calling Arafat's scheduled meeting with Clinton a "summit."

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has not received an invitation to Washington this year.

Netanyahu was also not included in a "national prayer" ceremony Congress organized last month, but Arafat was there, despite the opposition of some members of Congress and certain Jewish organizations. Clinton and Arafat met then.

Clinton's scheduling of meetings with Arafat without extending parallel invitations to Netanyahu are viewed in Israel as an intentional affront to Netanyahu during the election period and as an encouragement to Arafat's plans to declare independence.

The Palestinians say that the upcoming meeting with Clinton will again focus on conditions for postponing the declaration. In the past, Clinton has recognized the Palestinian right to self-determination, but has insisted that the precise status of the Palestinian territories be determined as part of the negotiations with Israel and not unilaterally.

A Palestinian source indicated that Arafat would consider a delay in return for something tangible, like a guarantee that the European Union and United States would recognize a Palestinian state when statehood is declared in the future.

Israel & the Jewish World

Sitting side by side on Jerusalem's bus 15

Court to protest the court's authority, was an unprecedented demonstration in size and unity.

According to Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Israel Religion Action Centre, which is part of the Reform movement in Israel, "What is happening now, is a direct onslaught on the judiciary, because the judiciary has emerged as the only independent source of authority in Israel which threatens the Orthodox establishment's hold over Jewish life in Israel."

Rabbi Menahem Porush, the driving force behind the rally last month, said the protest took place because the court wants to break the status quo.

"They tried to have us go back 50 years in time, to the days before the state was established. Because when the residents of this land appealed to the United Nations and asked, 'Give us a state of our own,' it was clear that the secular would rule us. [David] Ben-Gurion came and gave me the letter of the status quo. It was comprised of four clauses: Kashruth in public kitchens; education for everyone as they saw fit, in other words, that we would be able to build yeshivot of our own; marriage and divorce solely in accordance with Halachah; and the observance of the Sabbath," Rabbi Porush told Ma'ariv.

"Were people like Judge [Aharon] Barak not to come along right now and try to finesse these issues, we would have been able to continue living together peacefully and quietly. But as soon as someone comes along and says the status quo can be moved to the left and to the right, and that its flexibility can be tested, we get up and say, no way," he added.

Not surprisingly, Regev, a rabbi and a lawyer, disagrees with Porush. "I think the status quo is more a myth, than the reality."

When Rabbi Regev moved to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv at the end of 1978, he says there were "maybe three restaurants open on Shabbat." Now, he says, "there are probably well over 50 restaurants open on Shabbat. All of this the religious establishment doesn't really challenge. So, what's the status quo?

"What they're challenging are the areas which…deal directly with them, for instance, the issue of drafting Yeshiva students…Back in 1948 there were 300 students. You now have well over 30,000 students of draft age. So, they oppose that," said Rabbi Regev.

"They oppose areas that symbolically mean legitimization of the non-Orthodox stream, such as civil registration of Jewish identity for non-orthodox converts. It doesn't really affect their rights, but it symbolically affects their monopoly and it gives symbolic credence to the non-Orthodox streams. They can handle the secular; they have a difficult time handling the Reform and Conservative. So it's not as if they are reacting to a change in the status quo – some changes in the status quo are in their favor – but it is those areas in which they were able to oppress others and deny the non-Orthodox their freedom to practise their religious rights."

While the Haredim used the demonstration as a call to end tyranny against themselves, many Reform and Conservative Jews in Israel feel it is they who are being put in a stranglehold.

"[Haredim] are pro-democracy in any country other than Israel. In all other countries, they abide by the laws of the state except for here, where they try and blackmail the Knesset and the Supreme Court to approve laws in their favor," said Marne Rochester, who describes herself as an observant non-Orthodox Israeli Jew.

"The Haredim are politically very powerful…But democracy also means protecting the rights of all minorities, not just the Haredim but also the Reform and Conservative, and protecting the rights of secular majority," Rochester adds.

Many of the signs at the protest called for equality for Haredim. They called on the courts to halt the infringement on their rights.

But according to ACRI's Gil, "In the majority of the cases where religious groups talk about rights, they actually mean their communal wishes and goals…which are not rights."

Gil said it's a conflict between rights on the one hand, and interests of a community on the other.

Moshe Abergil, one of the owners of Drugstore 2000, a new supermarket in downtown Jerusalem that is open for business on Shabbat, agrees with Gil.

"The time has come to break the haredi grip on Jerusalem," said Abergil, during a demonstration that ensued outside his store on a recent Shabbat.

A conflict between rights and interests

"We have to hope the Haredim will understand the needs of the secular public in Jerusalem," said MK Avraham Poraz, outside Abergil's store on the first Shabbat that it was open.

But the fact that Israel is a Jewish state and a state that intertwines religious and secular laws makes these issues all the more problematic.

"You can't divorce Jewish laws from secular ones," said a modern Orthodox woman who didn't want to give her name. "This isn't an ordinary state. If I wanted to live in an ordinary state, I could have stayed in America or Canada. But I moved here to live in a Jewish state. The secular laws have to include the Jewish ones."

"This is a structural problem, like the problem always in America between the federal government and the states," said novelist A. B. Yehoshua. "In 200 years, there will still be someone who will speak about why the Supreme Court has too much power. It is built into our nature, because we will never entirely separate religion from state."

And it is here that the question of authority comes into play. Rabbi Regev suggests there can be two courts in one land, so long as there is one court that has overall authority.

Which court that is depends on who you talk to. The Haredim want their religious courts to have the final say. The majority of society wants secular law to rule.

Asked whether he sees a resolution to the conflict between the Haredim and the state, Gil bluntly said no. But he quickly added, "There are different measures that can be taken. This problem is old…the problem goes on as the State of Israel goes on, which is one proof the problem in itself does not risk the State of Israel.

"On the other hand," he said, "all measures must be taken to lower [levels of] tension and to come to agreements, at least in those areas where agreements are just a little possible."

In the Knesset, in the courts and on the streets, the conflict is far from being resolved.

But on the number 15 bus, religious and secular, haredi and modern Orthodox, Jews and Muslims sit side by side until the next stop.

Israel approves national security council concept

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The government has unanimously approved the establishment of a national security council (NSC) to focus on complex strategic issues such as the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, terrorist use of non-conventional weapons, and the Russian transfer of ballistic missiles to Iran.

The council will be headed by David Ivry, a former air force chief with 46 years of experience, most recently serving as senior strategic adviser to the defence minster.

Ivry's NSC will be stationed in the Prime Minister's Office. In an arrangement with Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon the new NSC will not deal with the peace process.

The cabinet decision said that the new body would not take powers from other government bodies, but instead, would be a coordinating body integrating various arms of the government.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu hailed the move at the cabinet meeting, noting that it culminates a quarter of a century of efforts by key figures calling for its establishment. In particular, he thanked Defence Minister Moshe Arens and Sharon for their support.

Israel Election Notebook

May 17

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his main challenger, Labor party leader Ehud Barak, both pledged to withdraw troops from Lebanon within a year after the May 17 elections. The pledges by Netanyahu and Barak followed two weeks of increased hostilities in south Lebanon in which seven IDF soldiers were killed, including Brig.-Gen. Erez Gerstein.

The pledges by the leaders evoked strong rebukes later in the week from some military officials who complained that the losses suffered the previous week should not be "politicized."

• The Labor party rejected Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon's call for an emergency unity government to address the pressing problems facing the Jewish state. Sharon, who has previously expressed his support for a unity government, said only a broad consensus could resolve the issues of Israel's presence in south Lebanon and the peace process. He added that, if necessary, the elections should be postponed.

• The Knesset House Committee approved splits in the Likud-Tsomet list and in the National Religious Party (NRP) list, bringing to more than 20 the number of MKs who have left their parties since the date was set for the upcoming elections.

MKs Hanan Porat and Zvi Hendel quit the NRP and announced the formation of a new faction called Emunim.

Rafael Eitan and Haim Dayan of Tsomet left the joint list they had formed with the Likud.

• The Labor party's central committee approved by a majority of 90 percent the formation of the One Israel Knesset list, headed by Ehud Barak, that includes Gesher and Meimad representatives.

The agreement stipulates that David Levy will rank third on the new list and will be appointed a senior minister and member of the security cabinet in any government formed after the elections.

In addition, to Levy, Gesher will have the 18th, 29th and 39th slot on the One Israel list.

The agreement with the moderate Orthodox party, Meimad, stipulates that the group's most senior representative will be appointed a minister in a government headed by Barak. Meimad will get the 17th, 33rd and 38th slots on the One Israel list.

The group had not yet selected its representatives but it was assumed that Prof. Avi Ravitzky would become the senior representative.

NEW JUDGE ON THE SUPREME COURT
Abd al-Rahmi Zuabi, 67, the first Israeli Arab judge to be appointed to the Supreme Court, enters court last week for his first day on the bench. [RNS/Reuters]

Marchi encourages investment in Israel of any country in the world wanting to widen its overseas commercial ties," Marchi said.

"We saw the win-win for Canadian industry in partnering and knowing Israeli companies better, so this is also an added value for Canada. Not only is it based on friendship and the ability of an economy to produce, but also the high grade nature of its economy.

"The second part is: How do you make the good story even better? That occupied most of the time I was with Trade Minister [Natan] Sharansky: Let us not just look at how successful the two years have been and sit on the status quo. Let's have the relationship grow even more."

Marchi wants to promote the benefits of the trade agreement in the two business communities so that they can understand the advantages and openings available to them. In particular, he wants to encourage small and medium-size firms to take advantage of the opportunities in the Israeli market. He therefore wants to establish a strong business advisory council attached to the CIFTA.

"It's not just the job of government to promote the free trade agreement; in fact there needs to be a partnership with the private sector. Clearly it is the private sector and not government that is to be the engine of job creation and ingenuity," he said. "The private sector can advise governments where there are perhaps certain barriers or problems in either regulations or standards and we [the government] can hopefully respond accordingly and facilitate more two-way traffic."

During the visit, Marchi signed a new telecommunications agreement to encourage further cooperation between Canada and Israel, to promote more joint ventures and to extend invitations for telecommunication firms to bid for contracts in each other's countries. It also has provision for the two countries to come together to bid for contracts in third countries.

"We should really be joining hands today in the future of high-tech and improving people-to-people links in culture and education," Marchi said. "As we strive to promote a bigger community presence in Israel, we also invite Israeli business to create investments in Canada.

"I know that everybody in Israel looks to the United States, as they all want a piece of the American pie, but Canada is a wonderful place to invest in, not only as a country, but as a gateway for unfettered access to the United States, Mexico and increasingly the Americas. Investment is creating the trade today, not the other way round."

During his visit to the PA, Marchi met with Chairman Yasser Arafat in Gaza and signed a trade agreement in Ramallah between the PA and Canada. The Canadian government maintains an economic office in Ramallah. The agreement with the PA, although not as far reaching as CIFTA will be, in Marchi's words, "elevated to a higher status only after progress in the peace process. Economic prosperity is intertwined with peace and vice versa. We see this as a modest Canadian contribution to bringing peace a little closer. We would like to see a bridge between Israeli, Canadian and Palestinian companies."

The Week in Israel

March 1

• Israeli media reported that Turkey's ambassador to the United States repeated denials that Jerusalem had anything to do with the capture of Kurdish leader Abdullah Ocalan. "That is something beyond the scope of our bilateral relations with Israel," Ambassador Baki Ilkin said.

March 2

• The chief rabbis and the leaders of the religious political parties discussed ways to block the implementation of the court-ordered appointment of Reform and Conservative representatives to local religious councils. One of the proposals was to dissolve the councils altogether.

March 3

• Israel and the White House denied as nonsense allegations that the Mossad had tapped Monica Lewinsky's phone conversations with President Bill Clinton and blackmailed him into calling off a search for an Israeli mole in the White House. The allegations were made in a book by a British author due out next week.

• Sorek Gefen, 24, an Israeli security guard shot last week during a training accident at the embassy in Amman died. He was critically wounded by a bullet from the gun of a senior Israeli official.

March 4

• Israeli media reported that King Abdullah named Abdul-Waouf Rawabdeh, a leading supporter of Jordan's 1994 peace treaty with Israel, as his new prime minister.

March 5

• A leading water expert warned of possible shortages if policies regarding water usage are not altered. Hillel Shoval said two-thirds of the potable water in Israel is used for agricultural purposes. His comments came after meteorologists described this winter as the driest in Israel since the early 1950s.

• In a further aggravation of already strained relations between Israel and the United States, Ha'aretz reported, the Clinton administration decided to hold up the transfer of $1.2 billion (US) in special aid promised Israel upon the signing of the Wye accord last October.

JERUSALEM — Until a few years ago, Tel Avivis used to joke about Jerusalem's non-existent night-life.

What are the three places in Jerusalem that remain open after midnight, they used to ask. Answer: The Western Wall, Angel's Bakery and the Hadassah Hospital emergency room.

But, things have changed since then, and there are quite a few pubs, bars, cinemas and discotheques to enjoy, and visitors and locals happily take part in the city's night-life.

I admit, that to the casual observer, Jerusalem still seems to pack it in by 10 p.m., but there are reasons for this somewhat misleading impression. Jerusalem has a reputation to protect. It is a serious town, and Jerusalemites are sophisticated in a different way than those fast-living folks in Tel Aviv.

For the tourist or traveller, night entertainment can be as important as the preceding day's sight-seeing. And it's there – one just has to look a little closer to find those places that are open late. You can hang out in bars with the best beer and live music, dance away in discotheques with the loudest beat and the longest drinks, or attend one of those magnificent outdoor performances held at night in the Tower of David's stunning ancient courtyard, or at the Sultan's Pool – provided you bring a sweater.

The Pool metamorphosed from a first-century water reservoir into an amphitheatre right below today's Yemin Moshe neighborhood. Some time ago, Toronto writer Bronwyn Drainie lived there for a couple of years, and in her book, My Jerusalem, describes how residents receive free tickets for each concert, to mellow their opposition to the nightly disturbance.

Up-to-date information about theatre performances, concerts and movies are easily obtained from the English-language publications available – The Jerusalem Post, This Week in Jerusalem, Hello Israel, and Your Jerusalem, the first being Jerusalem's daily, the latter brochures lying out in hotels and malls. The Traveller, a well-informed grassroots weekly, can be obtained at the bars and pubs it often reviews.

In addition to the climate and the non-flashy approach of its residents, Jerusalem is also a religious city. As such, public life comes to an almost complete halt on Friday afternoons. Many restaurants and cafes shut down, to reopen on Saturday night, and as soon as Shabbat ends, the streets in the centre of town become alive again with people out to have a good time.

Every now and then, the Haredim try to get those places which do stay open on Friday nights, to close down, but so far without much success. Without doubt, their demands are met in certain neighborhoods and this should be respected. Yet, as cultural life goes, pubs and bars are just as important as theatre and concert halls. As Jerusalem's former long-time mayor, Teddy Kollek, once explained in an interview, "The cultural institutions meet the needs of the non-religious, including, last but not least, the government officials. Culture is vital to Jerusalem, if it wants to remain a modern city."

The area best suited for a foray into the pleasure of Jerusalem nights, is found downtown. Concentrating in three main areas, the places are easily accessible. They offer alcoholic and non-alcoholic drinks, music and food, or at least snacks. Often, they have a happy hour in the late afternoon.

There is a pedestrian mall in Nahlat Shiv'a, one of New Jerusalem's first and now historic neighborhoods off Jaffa Road's eastern end. Tucked away in the network of narrow passageways, a considerable number of watering holes cater to different tastes. Here, for instance, you find The Underground on Yoel Solomon Street, a slightly raunchy meeting place for mostly younger tourists and locals that features music and dancing on the ground floor and a pub on the upper floor.

Then there is the neighboring Q Dance Bar, where things are equally busy, but can turn a little seedy when the hour gets late. Dancing activities here are hosted by a disc jockey starting shortly before midnight. The clientele is mixed, and also includes Jerusalem's gay scene.

The Blue Hole, also on Solomon Street calls itself the deepest bar in town and offers a fully stocked bar and non-stop classic rock.

Egon, a cafe and bar at Nahlat Shiv'a's In The Yard, which proudly advertises to be open until 5 a.m., also has a well-stocked bar, yet in intimate settings and a quiet atmosphere, where guests can play a game of sheshbesh and have a light breakfast before leaving.

Next is the zone near the Russian Compound, on the little streets of Jaffa Road's opposite side, a bit further west. The Glasnost Bar on Heleni Hamalka Street offers live music four nights a week, ranging from jazz, blues and reggae to salsa and samba. And they have Guiness on tap. So does Mike's Place, around the corner on Horkanos Street. In addition, this one has a reputation for an equally wide range of live music every night.

And there's Mike's neighbor, Galliano's, which some patrons fancy for its pool table, friendly service and reasonable prices. That is not to say that the other bars mentioned here are unduly expensive. The Strudel Café on Monbaz Street is Jerusalem's first and so far only Internet café offering e-mail services. It's a place to quietly hang out, to have a snack and a drink. The establishments mentioned are open every day until the small hours.

The third locale for an evening out is the Ben-Yehuda pedestrian mall. Though things here calm down earlier than near the Russian Compound and in Nahlat Shiv'a, patrons get a good opportunity for people-watching when the night is mild and tables and chairs remain outside. One of Jerusalem's oldest bars in the area is Fink's, a place on Histadrut Street that reportedly is the best pub in town, and is also said to cater to local and international celebrities.

Its limited space makes for an intimate, elbow-rubbing atmosphere, especially when crowded. Fink's history started with the mandatary period, when the British introduced some good old-fashioned European traditions to the city.

Jaffa Road itself also offers a couple of choices, such as Champs at no. 19, the Arizona at no. 37 and Habustan at no. 68. Champs is a regular pub featuring a large screen TV showing MTV and sports, as well as a dart board, pinball machine and video games.

Rivlin Street is a bustling pedestrian mall and colorful night stop

The disco and two fully stocked bars at the Arizona are patronized by young travellers from all over the world. Some time ago, an affiliated hostel opened its door on the premises. The atmosphere at Habustan is more relaxing, with live music six days a week and an affordable menu. Performances here include classical guitar blues, jazz and funk.

Those interested in a more oriental ambience might try Abu Shanab's Restaurant and Bar on 35 Latin Patriarchate Road in the Old City, not far from Jaffa Gate.

Set in a cave, the Khan Club in Jerusalem's historic inn, once used by caravans opposite the only train station, offers folklore performances, including belly dancing. It stays open until very late; reservations are recommended.

Miniature meticulously mirrors Budapest's Dohany St. Synagogue

Fashioned with love and artistry

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —Louis Weiss' replica of the Dohany Street Synagogue in Budapest, crafted from brass and bronze, is a wonder in miniature.

Weiss, who was born in Hungary, has spent 14 months – roughly 2,000 working hours – meticulously reproducing in 1:100 scale the elegant Moorish style building down to the finest detail.

Six steps lead to the main arched doorway below an embossed circular window flanked by polygonal pillars, each surmounted with a green-enameled dome to simulate the verdigris which forms on weathered copper. Between the pillars, standing above the cornice, are the Tablets of the Law.

Weiss has fashioned all four sides of the structure with love, artistry and superb technological skill. His grandson Alon, a computer graphic artist, formulated the reduced dimensions from photographs and other aids.

The Dohany Street Synagogue was planned by Ludwig Forster and its construction, which was supervised by architect Ignac Wechselmann, began July 40, 1854. The synagogue was dedicated on Sept. 6, 1859.

During World War II it was central to the Budapest ghetto. Extending along one side is a common grave where the remains of some of the 600,000 Hungarian Jews massacred in the Holocaust, are interred.

Close to this spot is a memorial in the form of an inverted menorah supporting a silver weeping willow, dedicated to those who died.

Weiss studied design, metal relief carving and etching at the art college in Budapest in the early 1940s and credits this training with helping to save his life after the Nazis deported him to Birkenau. He was later sent to Auschwitz where his engraving skills were required in a mammoth munitions factory.

Liberated by the Americans in 1945, he returned to Budapest and met his future wife, Lilli. In 1947 they set out for Palestine where their son and daughter were born.

Weiss served in the Israeli navy for seven years, working with highly qualified engineers from all over the world who, he says, "taught me so much!"

In 1955 he opened his own machine shop and by 1964 he became a representative for various European firms selling machine tools to Israel. Throughout these years he was heavily involved with the Israeli Ministry of Defence.

The Weisses left Israel in 1976, following their family to Canada. Here, Louis discovered that "at 50 I was over-age and over-qualified." Reluctantly retired, he turned to sculpture, mining a latent talent.

In 1987 he was selected as a member of the Canadian Sculptors' Association and has completed a series, Expressions of Music in Solid Brass. The 24 plaques — brass relief against a black background — focus on classical and non-classical music and dance. Also included is a miniature reproduction of the renowned Mozart Monument in Vienna, which is affixed to black marble.

Weiss has also created a scale model of the federal Parliament buildings in Ottawa.

He was not only liberated from a concentration camp but his talent, which evokes beauty and compassion, is a liberating force in his world of today.

The Budapest synagogue took Louis Weiss 2,000 hours to make.

Nostalgic film captures world that is no more

By BILL GLADSTONE

It has been 25 years since Joan Micklin Silver's film Hester Street first appeared on the silver screen. Although the slow-paced, 90-minute black and white drama is not as well known as Crossing Delancey, which Silver directed more than a decade later, I regard the earlier film as the more pure work of art.

A minor classic, it captures the flavor of 1890s Jewish life on the Lower East Side with succinct and delicious irony.

The film paints a realistic portrait of Russian-Jewish immigrants and their landscape of tenements, sweatshops, dingy cafeterias, market stalls, fire escapes and courtyards crisscrossed by lines of hanging laundry.

Carol Kane gives a stunning performance as Gitl, an old-fashioned wife who arrives at Ellis Island to join her husband Jake (Steve Keats), who has preceded her to New York.

Although Jake has shorn his beard and changed his shtetl clothing, Gitl initially refuses to surrender her sheitl and go out immodestly in her own hair; she protests, horrified, when Jake cuts off their 3-year-old son's ringlets. Hoping to please her husband, she agrees to call the boy Joey instead of Yossi. Jake hardly touches her; it's clear he no longer wants her.

As Gitl adapts to America, she learns that Jake is involved with a fancy modern woman, Mamie Fine, who has already been in America for seven years. Like Jake, Mamie has discarded the customs of the Old Country, and is sufficiently modern in her lifestyle to have no serious qualms about adultery.

Wanting to be Americans and not Jews, Jake and Mamie rush to embrace the newfangled values of their adoptive land. Convinced of their own cleverness, they sneer at the old-world bumpkins around them who are fresh off the boat. But the film ultimately paints them as misguided fools. They come across as far more dogmatic in their secularism than old-fashioned characters like Gitl, who cling to their Jewish roots and jokingly wish a pox (a curse) on Columbus for discovering America.

The screenplay is a smart adaptation of the novella, Yekl, by Abraham Cahan, the legendary first editor of the Yiddish Forward.

"With one tuches you can't dance at two weddings," a neighbor scolds Jake, one of many examples of how the film preserves the book's flavorful (if now somewhat clichéd) Yiddish idioms.

Besides Kane's extremely memorable portrayal of Gitl, I enjoy Hester Street for its various cameos: a smirking customs officer at Ellis Island, an overbearing sweatshop boss, a tenement neighbor who unhesitantly inveigles her way into other people's affairs, a rabbi's parlor, and – my favorite – an old Yiddish-speaking peddler whose pack seems to hold more goods than a department store, including a love potion that Gitl wants to give her husband.

The ending, in which the old values triumph over the modern, is supremely satisfying. Silver revisits the same theme (and locale) in

Collection of stories features 'Chekhov of the East Side'

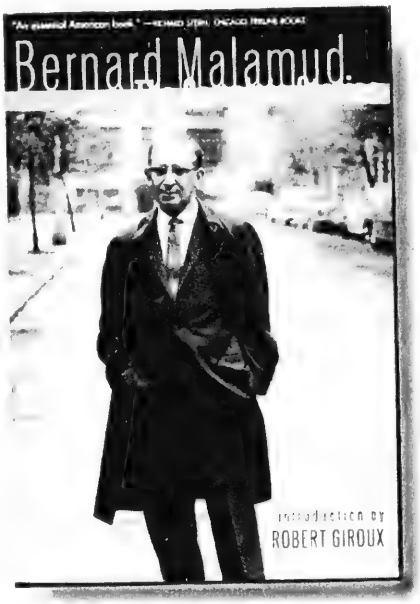
By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In a literary career that stretched roughly from 1940 to his death in 1986, Bernard Malamud wrote a handful of acclaimed novels, including The Natural, The Fixer and The Assistant.

Between the novels, the Pulitzer Prize-winning author refined his artistry by writing short stories.

For the first time, all of Malamud's short fiction has been gathered together in a single book which was published a while ago in hardcover.

Republished recently in softcover by Noonday, Bernard Malamud: Collected Stories ($26.95) contains 55 stories – and 55 good reasons why Malamud was called Peretz's literary heir by some, and a Chekhov of the East Side by others.



The son of immigrant shopkeepers in Brooklyn, Malamud wrote beautifully crafted stories about first-generation New York Jews in a variety of peculiar but realistic predicaments. Their speech, inflected with Yiddish dialect and cadences, is the language of the stranger in a strange land, the nuanced English of immigrants and the children of immigrants.

The quality of the stories wavers from very good to outstandingly wonderful. In the latter category are such masterpieces as The Magic Barrel, Rembrandt's Hat and The Silver Crown.

American novelist Cynthia Ozick once heard Malamud read The Silver Crown, and her first reaction was reportedly to wish with all her heart that she had written the story herself.

Many of the stories combine a gritty low realism with elements akin to magic, folk-tales and the fantastic. In The Silver Crown, the son of a dying man, although intensely rationalistic, seeks a spiritual healing cure from a mysterious Bronx rabbi, but quibbles over the size, price and efficacy of the silver crown that the rabbi says will cure his father.

In The Magic Barrel, another man seeks help from another professional – this time a rabbinical student and matchmaker.

Both stories reflect Malamud's tremendous agility with the form and economy of the short story, and his skill with the unexpected ending.

The writer once told an interviewer that he learned to condense his verbal tales from his father. "Vos haks du mir a chainik? What tune are you banging on your pot?" Malamud Sr. once said when Bernard was conveying a long tale about his mother's cousin.

Some of the stories reflect his parents' lives more directly. Several stories are set in grocery stores, which are usually painted as drab prisons, with their proprietors trapped in small, confined lives.

To paraphrase the late-19th-century British novelist Israel Zangwill, Malamud's New York stories seem to focus largely on the children and grandchildren of the ghetto. His characters are transplanted to the vast sparkling land of America, but they are hemmed in by the small rooms and vistas of their adoptive land as much as they are still bound by old world traditions, perceptions and ideas.

Their situations are often ironic, and their attitudes are often pessimistic, as though they are just discovering that America's streets never were paved with gold.

Malamud wrote with equal talent about gentiles in his handful of Italian stories, including The Maid's Shoes and Life is Better than Death. Some of these pieces focus on Americans transplanted to Rome, a landscape they can never truly understand.

All in all, surprises and delights await the sensitive reader who picks up this wonderful collection. Presented chronologically, the stories are bound to whet the appetite for the author's larger works.

Auction of Books and Maps: Sotheby's auction house is selling two important collections of maps and books relating to the Middle East, including several 19th-century books composed by famous pilgrims from distant lands.

The work of British artist David Roberts is well known to many travellers to Israel, and his book The Holy Land provides dramatic and romanticized images of the ancient and sacred sites. The work is expected to fetch about 28,000 pounds sterling or more.

The Wilderness of Sin, an archeological report published in 1914, is included in a lot of books expected to fetch several hundred pounds. The reason is that that particular treatise was written by T. E. Lawrence, who later became famous as Lawrence of Arabia. The auction takes place March 23 in London. 0171-293-5000.

A minor film classic

Crossing Delancey, but despite the latter's wider popular and commercial success, Hester Street is the better work.

At times, the plot and tempo of Hester Street may seem too slow for modern sensibilities, but that's precisely the point; it is an intensely authentic re-creation of the "world of our fathers" that Irving Howe chronicled so well in his book of the same name. The film brilliantly captures the rhythms of life of an earlier time.

When Hester Street first came out in 1974, a New York Times reviewer acknowledged it as a minor classic but complained it had too many crowded street scenes. Modern viewers, especially those with roots on the Lower East Side, may find the rich street fabric one of the film's most appealing elements.

Beyond the particular world of its characters, Hester Street shows us the mythic landscape of America (i.e. New York), which some two million Jews from eastern Europe experienced in the 19th and early 20th centuries. The movie is a deeply nostalgic and insightful portrait of a world that is no more, lovingly recaptured on celluloid.

If you saw Hester Street when it first came out, it's definitely worth a second look. It is available on videotape from First Run Features, 153 Waverly Place, New York N.Y., 10014.

BEIT HATEFUTSOTH TELLS STORY OF THE DIASPORA

One of the first items on display inside the doors of Beit Hatefutsoth, Tel Aviv's 21-year-old "museum" of the Diaspora, is a reproduction of the Arch of Titus in Rome, showing Roman legions carrying off the spoils from Jerusalem in 70 CE.

Titus, the Roman general who oversaw the destruction of the Second Temple and the exile of the Jews from Jerusalem, commissioned the arch to record his proud achievement for posterity. The arch still stands in Rome today, and Jews with a strong sense of history often refuse to pass through it.

Little could Titus have understood that 2,000 years later – long after the mighty Romans had receded from history – there would be a massive ingathering of Jewish exiles from throughout the Diaspora back to Israel.

The return of the Jews to Israel, one of the most dramatic episodes of modern history, is the story that Beit Hatefutsoth so brilliantly represents. Its six sections focus on various aspects of Jewish life as it was lived in diverse locales from ancient to modern times.

It is important to recognize that Beit Hatefutsoth is not a museum, since almost none of its artifacts are genuine. Rather, it is a sort of walk-through encyclopedia, vivid and colorful, concentrating on the simultaneous diversity and unity of the Jewish people throughout the many centuries of their dispersion.

One of the most impressive sections of Beit Hatefutsoth features models of some 30 famous synagogues that once stood or continue to stand in places from Pennsylvania to China. The models are large and painstakingly accurate. In most cases, they seem to reflect the architectural character of their host countries.

Only one model violates the second commandment prohibition against making graven images. For a reason that Judaic scholars and art historians are at pains to understand, images of human beings were represented in the art of an early synagogue in northern Syria. The original art is now housed in a museum in Damascus.

As my guide, Ze'ev Hamudot, explains, each of the various synagogue models reflects a particular community's comfort level within its respective country. Edifices such as the Great Synagogue of Amsterdam (1675) and the Curacao Synagogue (1732) reflect an architectural pride and boldness denoting the high level of Jewish comfort and confidence within these societies.

Similarly, the El Transito and so-called Santa Mario de la Blanca synagogues of Toledo, Spain, also exude a strong measure of architectural confidence. Both structures rose during the glory days of Spain's Jewish community, a century before the Inquisition and Jewish expulsion.

In Poland, synagogue architecture also reveals a high – and ultimately misplaced – level of confidence. The replica of Warsaw's Tlomacke Street Synagogue, for example, shows off a magnificent structure whose exterior walls were decorated with six-pointed stars, the stone tablets of the commandments, and other Jewish symbols. The synagogue was among thousands destroyed by the Nazis.

Also destroyed during World War II, the former wooden synagogue in Chorodov, Ukraine, is one of the most beautiful models on display. Its beautiful painted ceiling features lions, signs of the zodiac, and mythological animals such as unicorns. Restorationists relied upon black and white photographs to authenticate the interior, and interviewed Holocaust survivors to get a better sense of the interior's vibrant colors.

Gothic and eerie, Prague's medieval Altneuschul is one of the most strikingly original models on display. As in many countries, Jews were not permitted to build any structures higher than the local church or mosque, and counteracted this limitation by lowering the ground floor. The main floor of the Altneuschul is 10 steps below street level.

Other models represent originals in Florence, Venice, Cochin, Kaifeng, and other places.

"The final synagogue is very interesting," says Hamudot, referring to the Kaifeng building, which was several centuries old. "It was destroyed by floods on the Yellow River."

A section on the Jewish family offers tableaux of Jewish life. One display depicts a circumcision ceremony taking place in 19th-century Algeria, while another shows a bar mitzvah in 20th-century London.

These are only a few of Beit Hatefutsoth's many fascinating displays that bring the rich tapestry of Jewish history vibrantly to life. After the Israel Museum and Yad Vashem, Beit Hatefutsoth is one of Israel's prime attractions, and should be on the itinerary of every visitor. (03-646-2020).

Crazy Bones distributors grab tiger by the tail and control own destiny was then manufacturing plastic accessories, like coffin-shaped carrying cases for the Crazy Bones and selling them to Play Toy.

However, Play Toy went bankrupt around Christmas. Having stayed in contact with Fromm, Segal called him shortly after the company folded. He said Fromm advised him to get control of the product. By the time the dust settled, he and Fromm cobbled a partnership.

"Wayne and I got together to figure out how to license the product ourselves and take control of our destiny. I was bombarded by people wanting the product, big companies, individuals, other distributers. Everyone was coming out of the woodwork."

Fromm said that becoming a partner at a stage when Crazy Bones was hot was no longer as risky. "Play Toy had invested $1 million. We had a head start. The toy had already taken off. It was like having a tiger by the tail, and where do we go with it."

Nervous breakdowns possible in kids: expert

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — It is possible for a child as young as seven years old to have a nervous breakdown, according to an expert in behavioral problems.

For many children, the stresses of life are all too real, and without help, even the very young can experience a sense of hopelessness, Audrey Lowitz said at a recent workshop sponsored by Tiny Treasures Jewish nursery school.

Lowitz, who also specializes in parent education and early intervention, has worked with young children and their parents in Montreal and Baffin Island.

Lowitz stressed that even the most sheltered children are subject to the stress and strain of modern society.

"Today's child is constantly being hurried," said Lowitz. "By rushing through our tasks, we are teaching children that faster is better. Rushing children and rushing childhood has its consequences."

Children's lives are too scheduled, so that they "no longer have time to smell the flowers," she said.

She said that stress is a biological reaction of the body to certain occurrences, and pointed out such physical signs as headaches, pounding heart, upset stomach, low energy and changes in eating or sleeping habits.

Things to watch out for in children include irritability, uncontrollable temper, lack of interest in things once enjoyed, changes in school performance, feelings of inferiority and a sense of hopelessness.

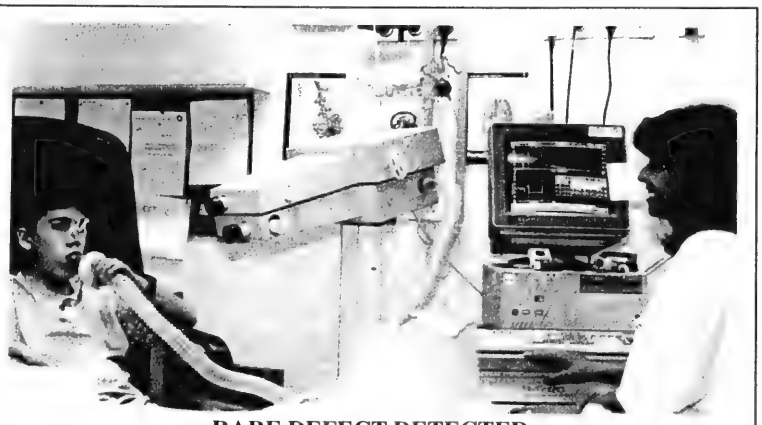
Although many stress-inducing situations, such as divorce, poverty or difficult family relationships, cannot be controlled by the child, there are coping techniques that can be learned.

The key, said Lowitz, is "teaching children that managing stress involves skills that can be learned. Anger occurs when a child is totally overwhelmed by emotion. The goal is to teach children to gain better control of their emotions.

"To me," says Lowitz, "self-esteem is the key. Self-esteem is self-respect. If you can respect yourself, you can deal with the stress."

She suggested techniques to teach children, such as meditation, yoga, exercise, and humor.

The workshop was held at the home of Jeff Taylor and Susie Weisman.



RARE DEFECT DETECTED

Twelve-year-old Rafael was brought all the way from Brazil to Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem, where his rare genetic metabolic defect was diagnosed. He underwent comprehensive tests, and here we see him undergoing lung function evaluation.

New leg-saving procedure used

TORONTO — A surgeon at the Branson Division of North York General Hospital is the first in Canada to perform a new leg-saving procedure for elderly and diabetic patients.

"This new technique is minimally invasive. We make two small incisions, one at each end of the affected area. Using an angioscope, a narrow tube with a camera at the end, we perform the surgery inside the leg while watching through the camera," said Dr. Ian Forrest, a vascular surgeon at the Branson Division.

This procedure is an in-situ bypass, in which a vein in the leg is used to bring blood to the foot of a patient who has severe narrowing of the arteries. This is a common complication associated with diabetes and cardiovascular disease.

Until now, surgeons made a long incision to expose the affected artery and neighboring vein as they connected the two, removed valves inside the vein to permit reverse blood flow, and closed off side branches of the vein.

Forrest became the first in Canada to perform the procedure, in November 1998, and has since done approximately half a dozen such surgeries.

"This [new] operation is done on patients who are at imminent risk of losing a leg to gangrene. These people often have diabetes or are elderly and have problems healing," said Forrest. "The smaller incisions mean hospital stays drop from between seven and 10 days to five or six. So, this surgery reduces pain and suffering, and patients can return home faster."

Demand for this type of surgery is significant. Between April and Sept. 30, 1996, for instance, the older procedure was performed 420 times in Ontario.

Another Registry Wedding ... It Can Happen To You

Jack believes he was destined to meet his new bride Ellie. They met through the Jewish Singles Registry (JSR) and dated for about eight months before walking down the aisle on December 6/98 - Jack's birthday. "It was a great birthday gift" the insurance industry worker said. "We talked on the phone for two hours the first time we connected. Then we went for a coffee a few days later and talked for two hours again. We have so much in common."

Coincidentally, Jack found that he and Ellie had gone to the same high school. His brother-in-law went to university with Ellie and was an usher at her first wedding. And she had met Jack's sister 14 years ago. "With all these coincidences it was meant to be," says the 42 year old Toronto man.

For her part, Ellie says she'd almost given up hope of finding the right man. "He's the most wonderful guy I ever met in my life," says the 41 year old library technician and mother of two.

More and more people are joining dating services like the Jewish Singles Registry. In fact February was one of their busiest months ever, reported Rob Singer, owner of the JSR. Most of their registrants are professionals and business people. With time these days, at a premium, the JSR makes it simple to find your significant other. A large database of members is available for members to peruse. Detailed profiles, along with photographs and voice personal messages, let JSR members make informed and quality dating choices. Professional staff are always on hand to give advice, feedback, and even make suggestions. While the Registry prides itself on allowing members to select for themselves who they would like to meet, Registry staff have become quite proficient at matching people together.

For its part the Registry is very serious about what it does. Members must provide personal identification before being allowed access to the database. The service is conveniently opened six days a week including most evenings. Even with three viewing computers, an appointment is highly recommended to reserve viewing time, usually a day or two in advance.

With all this going for the JSR members, the Registry takes it one step further. Membership in the Jewish Singles Registry now includes FREE membership in the ever so popular www.jmatch.com internet dating service. Close to 500 Toronto Jewish singles have already signed up since September /98. It's cyberdating at its finest.

So whether you are looking for friendship, a long term relationship, or something in between, the Jewish Singles Registry has someone right for you. Go in and see for yourself. They can be reached at (416) 483-4151, or e-mailed at jsreg@total.net. You can reach jmatch, by logging on to their website at www.jmatch.com.

Provincial champ now skates south of the border

Katz catches on with university hockey team

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — Last year, Jody Katz played collegiate hockey for the Concordia Stingers, a team that won the Canadian women's championship after a 27-1-4 season.

This year, at Niagara University, it's an entirely different story.

Jody Katz

Katz is learning all about losing.

She is one of four sophomores on a freshman-dominated team in its first year of competition. Playing in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference, the Purple Eagles have won only two of 14 league games, have been shut out six times and been outscored 69-16.

Margot Page, the team's coach and a member of four Canadian National Teams that won world championships, points out that rivals New Hampshire, Harvard and Northeastern "are three of the best women's hockey teams in the United States."

Midway through January, Niagara was living up to a pre-season coaches' poll that predicted it would finish 10th in the 14-college league. Its overall record, including exhibitions, was seven wins and 14 losses.

"Losing is a growing experience," declared Katz, a 5-foot-4 defencewoman who skates on the team's power play and penalty-killing units.

"Winning three provincial championships in four years [in high school] was fun, but it's great to be part of a new tradition.

"We're becoming better people, developing inner strength and getting better every game," Katz said.

"Losing by five or six goals to a top-notch team is good, but I hope and expect to be competitive with them in two to three years," Page said.

"I've known Jody for eight or 10 years, since she began coming to my hockey schools in Waterloo. She's playing very well; she's competitive, but she's also a perfectionist."

Jody Katz (left) with her coach Margot Page.

Coming from a championship team to a losing one hasn't been that much of a disappointment for Katz.

"We get bigger crowds here, about 200 compared to 50 at Concordia. And Margot and the rest of the coaches are so much more interested in us off the rink," she said.

"Margot has an 'open door' policy. She emphasizes academics more…she even helps us with our homework."

Katz is the daughter of Carl and Penny Katz and had her bat mitzvah at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

"My dad played hockey at McGill University. My brother Steven, who's 18, is doing the same thing. My younger brother David, who's 16, is on the Forest Hill High School select team," she said.

Katz's father played pickup games when she was little and coached her when she started out.

"I got the idea of playing by myself from watching dad and from seeing games on TV. He said I was good right away.

"Instead of going to the 'Jewish' social' Forest Hill, I went to the 'athletic' North Toronto Collegiate. "Most of my girlfriends were not athletic, but they were very supportive of me and would come to nearby league games and always to the provincial championship games.

"But they'd be out all weekend being social and I'd have to be in early to get the proper rest before an important game," she said.

Katz played for the Junior Aeros in an intermediate AA league, the highest level for women 21 and under.

Although somewhat discouraged after hitting the goal post four times on shots against New Hampshire, the left-handed shooting Katz said she prefers "to start the development of a play. I've always taken more pride in my assists than my goals."

Her ultimate hockey goal, after helping Niagara become a winning team, would be to represent Canada on its women's Olympic team.

The Inside Back

The mother of all projects

By JORDAN MAX

I nervously approached my wife doing the dishes. "Got a minute? I've got something really neat to show you."

She gave me that quizzical look which told me I had exactly 10 seconds to make my point.

Last Laugh

"Remember how last year we nearly drove ourselves crazy getting ready for Pesach? Remember how we swore that next year would be different?"

"Yes" she replied, skeptically.

"Well, I've solved our problem. I have created the mother of all computer software programs for the mother of all projects."

"So that's where you've been for the past month. Just what are you talking about?"

"Well" I responded enthusiastically, "first I took some basic project management software, which I customized to our Pesach requirements and timetable, added a few bells and whistles, modified it with some re-engineering software for maximum efficiencies of labor and materials, and voilá, instant Pesach preparation work plan!

Of course, I did have to use a bit of the space shuttle computer to run it, given its size and complexity, but it's all for a mitzvah, right?"

"You mean you hacked into the NASA computer for this?" she asked "Isn't that illegal?"

"Shhhh, someone'll hear you. I like to think of it as beta testing. Besides, just look at the results," I retorted, trying desperately to change the subject.

I proudly displayed my multi-volume binder set of flow charts, time sequences and multi-colored, multi-layered task orders.

"Now the beauty of this system is in its exactitude. I've accounted for all contingencies, all circumstances, all variables."

"All right, mister programmer hot shot. Let's take a look at your newest mousetrap," she began, obviously humoring me. She flipped over a few pages. "According to this, you start your Pesach cleaning two weeks before, that's a little tight, I usually start a month before...

"Well, that's only because you haven't optimized your work." I confidently replied.

She glared back, and then, after calming down, said with some apparent glee.. "I think you've got a few bugs here."

"What do you mean, I've triple tested it. It's perfect!"

"Here, for example, at P minus 13 days. It says here, "evening schedule: dinner 6 to 6:15p.m. worker 1 vacuums upstairs closet 6:17 to 6:23, vacuums upstairs carpet, 6:23 to 6:30.

"Worker 2 cleans bedroom, worker 3 empties clothes drawers, worker 4 cleans up toys..."

"So?" I asked naively, "What's wrong with that?"

"First of all, dinner takes longer than 15 minutes. Number Two, worker 1 is still required to clean up the dinner dishes, worker 2 isn't home from the office until 7:00, worker 3 is busy doing his homework, workers 4 and 5 can't lift the vacuum, worker 5 has to go to bed by 7:00 so all has to be quiet, workers 3,4 and 5 have to have baths and be read stories..."

"Okay, okay, I get the point. No problem, I can revise, but this is going to be a lot of work. So what's your system? You got any better ideas?

"It's rather simple" she replied. "You just work until the work is done, any available moment.

No fancy systems, no bells and whistles. Here, let me demonstrate. You can get started right about now. Pick up the vacuum cleaner..."

"That's the thing that makes all that noise when you turn it on?"

"Right on, space captain. Come on, you missed a spot. Put a little elbow grease into it, will you?..."

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I've just finished my exams and I didn't do that well in math. I know my parents are going to kill me. My dad already told me that if I didn't get an 80 percent average, I wouldn't be allowed to get my driver's learning permit, and I know this math mark will bring my average down below 80 percent. I've tried to think of ways to explain the mark, but I can't justify it. I'm just not good in math and my parents won't accept that as an excuse. I even went for extra help. I want to drive so badly. All my friends are already driving, and I would do anything to be able to drive too. Can you give me any suggestions on what to say to my parents when I hand them my report card?

"Dead" Driver

Dear "Dead" Driver,

If your parents are unaware of your problems with math up until this point, it may not be the wisest decision to show them your report card with the bad math mark on it right away. Not that you should hide it from them, but you should try to ease them into the idea that you are not doing well in math. If you just show them your report card without any warning, your unsatisfactory mark will come as a shock to them. If you just show them the report card and attempt to explain yourself, they will probably be angry with you for not telling them about it sooner.

Before you get your report card, show them your most recent test and homework so that they can gain some insight into the subject. Since you are trying to improve in math, be sure to mention to your parents that you were in extra help, or perhaps tell them about the right answer that you got in class that day to show them that you are trying to improve. There is still a whole new semester in which you can strive to excel more in math and work hard to get that 80 percent.

It is not the end of the world if you end up getting your licence a few months after all of your friends, but if you really do want to get your learner's permit, you should talk to your parents and reach a compromise. If you feel that the expectation of getting an 80 percent average is unrealistic and unfair to you, then you should tell your parents how you feel.

Try to reach some sort of compromise, where both parties can reach a goal that they feel is appropriate and fair. For example, if you offer to help out with some household chore in exchange for getting your permit, you will both be satisfied.

Good luck with math and driving! With the proper communication between you and your parents, it will be easier to explain yourself and your feelings.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto.

Witness links unit to mass shootings

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A labor camp guard unit that included alleged Nazi collaborator Wasyl Odynsky, randomly shot Jews for minor camp violations, fired on prisoners attempting to escape, and murdered hundreds of Jewish prisoners when the camps were liquidated, a citizenship hearing was told last week.

The auxiliary units at the Trawniki and Poniatowa labor camps consisted of Ukrainian volunteers who were faced with the choice of forced labor in Germany or performing police duty, said historian Yitshak Arad. Many chose to enlist to avoid being sent to Germany, he added.

War crimes case

The department of citizenship and immigration alleges Odynsky served as a guard at Trawniki and Poniatowa in 1943-44, and that he lied about his wartime activities when he immigrated to Canada in 1948. Federal authorities are seeking to strip him of citizenship and deport him.

Odynsky contends he was forced to enlist in the Trawniki guard unit, that he was confined to barracks when the wholesale murder of Jewish prisoners took place, and that he was never asked by Canadian authorities about his activities during World War II.

Last week, Arad, author of Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps, outlined the historical circumstances that preceded the murder of Jews in the German-run General-Government of Poland.

Trawniki, located southeast of Lublin in the General-Government, served as a training centre for Ukrainian guards who were enlisted as auxiliaries to SS killing units, Arad stated. In addition, a labor camp was operated at Trawniki, consisting of a workforce of Jews transferred when the Warsaw Ghetto was destroyed in April-May 1943. Poniatowa, located 36 km west of Lublin, housed 15,000 Jews transferred there after the liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto.

Following a Jewish uprising at Sobibor in October 1943 in which several German SS men and Ukrainian guards were killed, the SS ordered the liquidation of the two labor camps. Although special units were called in to do the shooting (15,000 at Poniatowa, 10,000 at Trawniki), the camps' Ukrainian guards killed several hundred remaining Jews who had been kept alive to cremate the corpses.

During cross-examination by Odynsky's lawyer, Brian Armstrong, Arad was closely questioned about a 34-page report he prepared for the case. He was asked about the accuracy of his footnotes and about his conclusion that it was

CANADA

Transnistria Survivors

TORONTO — Canadian survivors of Transnistria are invited to take part in a ceremony April 18 at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, at which Transnistria will be permanently represented on the marble walls of the Hall of Remembrance. During the Holocaust, roughly 300,000 Jews perished in the region straddling modern-day Romania and Ukraine. There will be an unveiling and candlelighting ceremony. For details, call Etty Zigler at 416-638-1291.

Headgear Policy Reversed

BARRIE, Ont. — The local branch of the Royal Canadian Legion has reversed its policy on the wearing of headgear in legion halls. Branch 147 changed its policy to conform to most other legions in the country after it was refused a $25,000 city grant, presumably because it did not allow the wearing of religious headgear, including kippot and turbans. The majority of Canada's 1,600 legions allow religious headdress.

ISRAEL

U of T Sponsors Workshop

JERUSALEM — A continuing education workshop sponsored by the University of Toronto brought together Israeli and Palestinian researchers for a one-day seminar at Al-Quds University here last week. The workshop on The Management and Science of Hearing Loss was attended by over 20 Canadian, Israeli and Palestinian experts on hereditary hearing loss.

Secular Burials Take Place

BEERSHEVA — Israel's first secular burials took place at a cemetery here earlier this month. The bodies of Ya'akov and Hannah Ravervi had been stored at a medical institute for six months, while secular rights advocates wrangled with Orthodox religious officials over where the burial plots would be located. The Supreme Court ruled in 1996 against the Orthodox monopoly over burials, and ordered the Religious Affairs Ministry to set aside space in Jewish cemeteries for "alternative" burials.

Radio Legislation On Hold

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court temporarily froze legislation passed last month legalizing a pirate radio station run by Jewish settlers. The judges, ruling on a petition submitted by left-wing legislators, called on the government to verify the legality of the procedure under which the Knesset gave Arutz-7 permission to broadcast after the station operated illegally for 10 years.

Officer Heads Delegation

JERUSALEM — The highest-ranking female officer in the Israel Defence Force is heading Israel's delegation to the UN Commission on the Status of Women. Brig.-Gen. Orit Adato and seven female leaders in business, medicine and social work will share their expertise at the 43rd annual meeting of the advisory commission to the UN General Assembly. During the meetings, which end March 19, Adato will speak to UN committees concerning gender roles in the military.

WORLD

Menorah For Vatican

ROME — A menorah to commemorate the victims of the Holocaust will be permanently installed at the Vatican next month. A delegation of American rabbis is to participate in the ceremony, which will launch a series of projects aimed at furthering Jewish-Catholic understanding.

Rampage At Synagogue

MOSCOW — Vandals went on a rampage at a synagogue in the Siberian city of Novosibirsk. The entire synagogue and its contents, except for the Torah scrolls, were damaged in the attack. The incident took place amid a recent increase in Russian anti-Semitism, sparked in part by the nation's ongoing economic troubles.

German Firm Sued

LOS ANGELES — Five Los Angeles residents filed a lawsuit against a major German architectural and construction firm demanding compensation for years of unpaid slave labor during World War II. The suit against Philipp Holzmann AG is the first of its kind brought before a California court.

Poles Oppose Plans

WARSAW — Hundreds of Poles demonstrated against government plans to turn the area around the former Auschwitz death camp into a protected zone in which no unauthorized projects could be built. The plan to create the zone came after Jewish groups protested the erection of hundreds of crosses last year near Auschwitz.

Swiss To Investigate

BERN — Swiss officials said they would investigate allegations that Nazi SS accounts worth as much as $700,000 were transferred to banks in Switzerland during World War II. The vow came after the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre publicized a wartime document about the money, which it said should be given to Holocaust victims.

Norway Creates Fund

OSLO — Norwegian Jewish leaders hailed a decision by the nation's parliament to create a $58-million Holocaust fund. Some $26 million of that will be given to Jewish victims of the Nazis, with the remaining $32 million earmarked for various projects, including the creation of a Holocaust studies centre in Norway. Some 2,200 Jews were arrested in Norway during the Nazi occupation.

Former Consul To Montreal Is New Diaspora Envoy

WARSAW — The Polish government has named a former theatre critic and consul in Montreal as its new roving ambassador to the Diaspora.

Malgorzata Dzieduszycka will replace Krzystof Sliwinski, who was the first person to be appointed to the unprecedented Foreign Ministry post, created in 1995 in an attempt to improve often-troubled relations between Poland and the world's Jewish population.

The post was created largely at the initiative of Poland's then-foreign minister, Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, an Auschwitz survivor who has been honored by Israel as Righteous Among the Nations.

Stanislaw Krajewski, a leader of the Jewish community in Poland, described Dzieduszycka as a "sensitive person" and said he considered her a "very good" choice for the post.

Jewish groups concerned at anti-abortion parley

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — National Jewish organizations are expressing concern over the coming conference in Toronto of Human Life International (HLI), a radical anti-abortion group that has been accused of harboring anti-Semitic views.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is also concerned that Toronto's Roman Catholic archdiocese appears to be giving HLI its support.

The staunchly Catholic HLI will hold its convention at the International Plaza Hotel April 7 to 11, and CJC has written the hotel a letter, making it aware of possible hate propaganda the group might distribute and of the controversy it has caused in the past.

Riots broke out in Montreal when HLI met there in 1995, and Jewish groups expressed similar concerns about the organization's extreme views. In Ottawa in 1992, the group was met with noisy demonstrations by gay and pro-choice activists.

Dozens of speakers and programs are being touted at the Toronto gathering. HLI, which says it is active in 88 countries, is fiercely pro-family, against public schooling, for chastity, militant in its Catholicism, and refers to abortion as "baby killing."

CJC says the group is on the "fringe right" of the anti-abortion movement and has ties to other extremist organizations.

Its founder and chair, Father Paul Marx, who is scheduled to speak in Toronto, has authored at least one anti-Semitic screed. Entitled Pro-Abortion Jews and the New Holocaust, the article, published in 1987, said: "The same segment of the Jewish community that accuses the Pope of insensitivity to the Jewish Holocaust not only condones but has more or less led the greatest holocaust of all time, the war on unborn babies."

Father Marx goes on to accuse prominent Jews around the world – Simone Weil, Henry Morgentaler, Betty Friedan and Gloria Steinem – of being the chief proponents of abortion. "Among the chief crusaders for abortion in England were prominent Jews," he wrote, adding "I think I can prove that Israel's Jews have one of the highest abortion rates in the world."

HLI has never repudiated Father Marx's writings. Nor has it denounced the use of violence against doctors who perform abortions.

In fact, in a 1993 newsletter, the organization accused Jews "of presiding over the greatest holocaust in the history of the world: the efficient destruction of more than 30 million pre-born children in this country [the United States]."

"We have many specific concerns," said CJC's Dani Fine. "The abortion issue should not be couched in racist and anti-Semitic terms."

Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, said her organization will monitor the situation "and do our best to denounce and expose the anti-Semitism that is at the root of what they're doing."

Ellen Cole, chair of CJC Ontario region's community relations committee, said HLI has ties to neo-Nazi groups. "This is not an abortion issue," she said. "It's an extremist issue."

CJC is upset that the conference appears to have the backing of Toronto's Catholic archdiocese. The eight-page program touting the HLI convention was delivered inside the March 8 issue of the Catholic Register, which is published and funded by the archdiocese.

As well, the HLI program notes that M. Pearse Lacey, auxiliary bishop emeritus of Toronto, and Father Thomas Lynch are slated to deliver the opening mass and homily at the conference. The program notes that both men are from the "archdiocese of Toronto."

Suzanne Scorsone, a spokesperson for the archdiocese, emphatically denied that the archdiocese supports HLI.

"We have no connection with them. We are not affiliated with them at all. They didn't get permission from the archdiocese to have their conference here. They have their own members and constituency," Scorsone told The CJN.

She said HLI's program was carried by the Catholic Register as a paid ad. "I'm sure the editor wouldn't distribute material with noxious content." She said there's "nothing anti-Semitic" about the program.

As for the two Catholic clergymen's scheduled appearance at the conference, Scorsone said the HLI program's description of them as representing the archdiocese is "an error. They [HLI] had no authority to use that.

"The archdiocese is not officially represented" at the conference. "Everyone who is there, is there as an individual."

The CJN's calls to HLI's Ottawa office were not returned.

From the editor's desk

Little fanfare, great importance

Last week, in this space, I wrote about the need to infuse intra-communal relations with civility and mutual respect. A press release that came across my desk a few days ago is the perfect follow-up to that column.

In three days, on March 21, the Institute for Jewish Studies will officially open in Israel. It is a very important development for the Jewish world, even though it will mostly go unnoticed in Israel, greeted with little fanfare and in some circles even scorned.

The institute is the centrepiece of the compromise solution proposed by Ya'acov Ne'eman and the seven-person committee he chaired at the request of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to respond to the "conversion/unity/pluralism" crisis in relations between Israel and Diaspora Jewry.

In November 1997, at the General Assembly (GA) of the Council of Jewish Federations in Indianapolis, to an audience of nearly 4,000 North American Jewish community workers, volunteers and leaders, Netanyahu announced the creation of the committee.

Its chief task was to recommend a path by which Jewish unity worldwide might be preserved in the wake of the anger felt by the majority of affiliated Diaspora Jewry over the efforts by the Orthodox establishment in Israel to prevent participation by the Reform and Conservative streams in Israel on municipal religious councils and in conversion matters.

As we know, those issues remain unresolved; the anger still simmers even today.

The committee came forward with its recommendations some six months later.

An institute, to be staffed by educators from all the streams of Judaism, would provide a comprehensive education for Jews in Israel seeking conversion. It was seen as both the foundation stone and the stepping stone for a future, much larger edifice of intra-communal cooperation. The conversion itself would be performed according to Halachah.

On April 27, 1998, in a meeting with Ne'eman, Natan Sharansky, Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg and representatives of the three main streams of Judaism, the establishment of the Institute was announced.

Ne'eman is no longer part of the Netanyahu government, having resigned some weeks ago from his finance portfolio. In Israel and beyond, he is universally respected and lauded as a serious man, a man of honesty and of integrity.

He regarded the work of the committee and in particular, his role in steering it, with almost prophetic zeal. The unity of the Jewish people was and remains for him an inviolate ideal.

"I have the privilege and the responsibility to chair a historic seven member committee that is trying to grapple with issues that threaten to drive a wedge between many Jews in North America and the State of Israel," he told the GA.

"Nothing is as important as finding ways to heal the rifts that threaten to divide the Jewish people …History will judge us all by how we respond to this challenge and responsibility…We have no choice but to find a solution. Failure to reach an understanding means the division of the Jewish people. The future of the Jewish people depends on the consent and the successful conclusion of the committee." (Our emphasis)

Those words left a profound impression on everyone who heard them spoken that day in Indianapolis even as they do today by anyone who reads them on this page.

To Ne'eman's and the government's deep disappointment, however, the committee's recommendations were not universally acclaimed.

With its eyes fixed firmly on the haredi establishment, the Chief Rabbinate refused to sign them. But nor did they expressly reject them.

However, without a de jure recognition by the Chief Rabbinate, the committee's recommendations were left in a religious netherworld like abandoned offspring, unembraced and unwanted, and thus correctly viewed by the other religious streams as de facto rejected.

Nevertheless, to their credit, the government and the committee decided to push on, even in the face of the Chief Rabbinate's de facto rejection of the core recommendations. In time-honored Israeli fashion, they decided to create "facts on the ground." In this case, those facts are the three campuses of the Institute for Jewish Education: in Beersheva, Raanana and Kiryat Yam.

These Institutes of Judaism will become part of the permanent Jewish landscape of Israel. Though their entry onto that landscape may be unheralded, their impact will be long-lasting. There will be the predictable attempts to marginalize the institutes and their role. But in the long run, these attempts are destined to fail as more and more Israelis embrace the underlying, inherent wisdom of the Ne'eman approach. (Please see Gerald Steinberg's column on page 10.)

Canadian Jewry should pay close attention to the Ne'eman initiative because we support it through our national UJA/CJA UIA campaigns.

In next week's column I will describe the institute's mandate and identify its key decision-makers.

Israel faces four broad challenges to national security, analyst says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel faces four broad challenges to its national security, according to a prominent Israeli analyst.

In the short run, Israel must cope with the spectre of Palestinian Islamic terrorism and the problem posed by its increasingly costly occupation of southern Lebanon, said Shai Feldman, head of the Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University.

Over a longer period of time, Israel should be wary of attempts by Iraq and Iran to acquire non-conventional weapons of mass destruction, he added.

Here under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, Feldman said that the key to combatting Islamic terrorism, apart from intelligence-gathering and closures, is security co-operation between Israel and the Palestine Authority (PA).

"There have been ups and downs in the level of cooperation, but now it is quite satisfactory," he observed in an interview.

Feldman said that continued Palestinian cooperation can be expected as long as Yasser Arafat, the PA president, feels that the Oslo peace process is moving forward.

Taking issue with the current Israeli government's assertion that the PA has stopped cooperating, Feldman said that domestic political considerations impelled Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to make that claim.

In Feldman's view, Israel will resume peace negotiations with the PA after the May 17 election, regardless of the outcome.

Shai Feldman

The style and pace of the talks will be determined by the new government. But the resumption of talks is a certainty: the vast majority of Israelis believe in peace, and Israel's economic growth is inextricably bound up with progress in the peace process.

Feldman said that most members of the Israeli elite accept the inevitability of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israel's task is to ensure that it represents a minimal threat to its vital interests, he said.

Envisioning the shape of Israel's relations with a future Palestinian state, Feldman called for "political separation," coupled with economic interdependence. "We need a situation in which the Palestinians have a stake in economic stability."

As for Lebanon, Feldman said that there is practically no alternative to Israel's self-declared security zone in the southern part of that country.

A unilateral withdrawal is a non-starter because there are no guarantees that Hezbollah, Israel's military adversary, will not take its fight beyond the Lebanese border.

Israel can only pull out of Lebanon after it reaches an agreement with Syria over the status of the Golan Heights, he said.

In Feldman's opinion, the next Israeli government will resume direct talks with Syria at approximately the point they broke off in 1996.

But, he warned, there will be a serious debate on both sides as to exactly where these negotiations ended.

Turning to Iraq, Feldman said that Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi leader, will doubtless try to rebuild his non-conventional force after United Nations sanctions are lifted.

Western export controls will make it harder for him to accomplish this goal. But Iraq may confound the West by recruiting Russian scientists and buying enriched uranium and plutonium from Russia.

Iran clearly wants to develop weapons of mass destruction, but is also interested in rebuilding ties with the United States.

Iran, however, cannot achieve its second objective unless it moderates its attitude toward Israel. Teheran can do so by cutting off the flow of arms to Hezbollah and by accepting the Arab-Israeli peace process, he explained.

Feldman said the degree to which Moscow helps Iran build long-range missiles is dependent on Russia economic well-being. If its economy collapses, it will be next to impossible to put an end to Russian cooperation with Iran in this field.

Iran may well be the first Muslim state in the Middle East to become a nuclear power, said Feldman, the author of a book entitled Israeli Nuclear Deterrence.

Israel's own nuclear arsenal is an effective deterrence, an "existential insurance policy," against external threats, he said.

Feldman acknowledged that Russia is selling its old ally, Syria, an array of sophisticated weaponry, but noted that these sales "are a far cry from Soviet days."

Feldman said that the current tension between Israel and the United States over the stalled peace process has not affected their integral security relationship.

"The Clinton administration's strategy is to isolate the defence relationship from the ongoing debate over the peace process."

Teen dies in traffic accident

TORONTO — A 15-year old Beth Jacob High School student, who was injured in a traffic accident on March 4, died at Sunnybrook Hospital last week.

Ruchama Zlotnick was crossing Lawrence Avenue at the crosswalk at Welland Road when she was hit by a car driven by a fellow student. Reports from the scene say that the driver may have been blinded by the sun.

Hatzalah, the recently formed emergency response organization, was the first paramedic group on the scene.

Throughout the week, prayers and tehillim (psalms) were said by members of the Orthodox community, both privately and in organized groups.

As of The CJN's deadline, no charges had been laid. A police investigation is continuing.

Hospitals put spotlight on domestic violence

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Danielle endured over a dozen years with an abusive husband before she found the strength to leave him.

Last week, the attractive, articulate, well-dressed woman told a rapt audience her story as part of the kickoff event for Domestic Violence Awareness Week, a program of Mount Sinai Hospital and the Toronto Hospital.

"Listen to my experience," she said. "It could be your neighbor, your friend, your sister, or even yourself."

Danielle – who credited Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) as "a light that helped me get through the tunnel" – spoke alongside Ana Marques of the Abrigo Centre for Victims of Family Violence, Gail Gould of JF&CS, and Joanne Verbeek of the Toronto Police Service. The panel discussion, moderated by Mount Sinai nurse Hilda Swirsky, was entitled Domestic Violence Through the Life Course.

Abuse does not refer only to physical or sexual abuse, clarified Danielle. Verbal abuse, the focus of her talk, "can obliterate one's self-esteem [and even] one's entire sense of self... It scars you for life."

It also affects physical health, family and friends, and – like all abuse – it spans every racial and socio-economic class, Danielle noted.

"I was told I was stupid," she began. "I was useless, I wasn't worth loving... I was lazy, I was ugly, I was too fat, I was too skinny, and I was every four-letter word in the book, even in front of my children.

"I was isolated from family and friends because they had a 'bad influence' on me and they were also useless. I was never asked, always ordered, never appreciated, always criticized. I was blamed for everything that went wrong...

"I was kept in the dark about finances, put in the position of having to ask for every penny and finally having to provide receipts accounting for every penny spent."

What was worse, she said, was that her young children learned to be abusive. "It is I who must help break this cycle," she concluded. Leaving is "terrifying," she said.

Four years later, she lives with hope, and is still working to rebuild her life. "I am remembering who I was and striving to be so much more."

Danielle noted that her husband had used religion in a controlling fashion. She felt her love for Judaism had been erased, but is grateful for the words of a rabbi with whom she spoke as her relationship was ending.

The rabbi affirmed that what Danielle had experienced was "not Judaism" and told her if she had to take her children away in order to bring them back with love, then she must do so, she recalled.

Problem 'intensely concealed'

A Los Angeles report indicates no difference in the rate of violence among Orthodox, Conservative and Reform families, said Gould, who is supervisor of the woman abuse program at JF&CS. Statistics show that "right here in our own Jewish community there are many women who've experienced some form of abuse" – verbal, sexual and physical.

The actual incidence is not known because the problem is "so intensely concealed," Gould said.

She is often asked why Jewish women stay in abusive relationships, a question she feels puts blame on the women instead of the abusive men.

However, she said, there are some reasons for staying that are unique to Jewish women, among them a fear of anti-Semitic reprisal, and the sense she'll be letting down the entire community by disclosing.

"We also know that women stay to preserve the family," Gould said. "The concept of Shalom Bayit, or marital peace, is deeply pervasive and deeply entrenched. Unfortunately, many women mistakenly believe that peace must be achieved at any price."

Socio-economic status plays a role in women's decisions to stay too, said Gould. "Often the higher the status the more difficult it is... fearing the loss of their home, their status and the disgrace their children will suffer."

The real shandeh of abuse, said Gould, is "if all of us continue to deny, don't protect and don't prevent something from happening."

Marques, who works mainly with adolescents, said we need to make sure that young people who've been affected by abuse are safe, that they know they're not alone, that they're not to blame, that abuse is a crime and that counselling is available.

Elder abuse can be physical, psychological, financial, sexual or a case of neglect, said Verbeek, Toronto Police elder abuse co-ordinator. The term applies to any harm to someone over age 65, by a person in a position of trust or authority.

Possible indicators of elder abuse include injuries, bruising, weight loss, unexplained accidents, depression, caregiver stress or a family member speaking on behalf of a senior, Verbeek said. "Sometimes we have to remember to speak to the senior him or herself," she cautioned.

Although citizens are not required by law to reported suspected elder abuse, Verbeek believes we all have an ethical duty to report such cases to police, a social service agency, or Crimestoppers.

Abuse "is only stopped when it is no longer a secret," she said.

Other awareness week events addressed post-traumatic stress syndrome and concerns of immigrant women. Robert Solomon, associate dean of the University of Western Ontario's faculty of law, spoke on Domestic Violence and Documentation. Judy Rebick, host of CBC Newsworld's From the Hip, spoke on Beyond Breaking the Silence at a reception honoring women for domestic violence-related work.

Educator traces evolution of U.S.-Israeli relations

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The Reform and Conservative movements are gaining strength in Israel, and are increasingly helping to shape the Jewish identity of non-Orthodox Israelis, says the chair of the political science department of Tel Aviv University (TAU).

Prof. Yossi Shain was speaking on Redefining our Jewish identity: the impact on Israeli-Diaspora relations, at the Adath Israel Synagogue. He was recently in Toronto as part of a North American tour to promote his new book, Marketing the American Creed Abroad (Cambridge University Press).

In his speech, he also traced the evolution of American-Israeli relations, which he said have gone through many changes in the last 50 to 60 years.

The growing Reform and Conservative movements in Israel, which are rooted in the American Jewish experience, are "filling a vacuum" created by secularism and Orthodoxy, the two extremes of Israeli society. These more liberal forms of Judaism are attracting Israelis who are looking for alternative ways of redefining their Jewishness, Shain said. "Many Israelis are drawing their identity from the Diaspora."

He said Israeli writers such as Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua are urging Israelis to join Reform and Conservative synagogues, "to find their Jewish identity in American creations of Judaism."

However, following these streams of Judaism is difficult, Shain said. "The domination of Orthodoxy over religious life leaves very little room for other practices."

He explained that most secular Israelis "don't practise anything," because they are "disenchanted by religion, due to Orthodox dominance."

The secularists' resentment of the Orthodox monopoly has been mounting, and it came to a climax last month in Jerusalem with the counter-demonstration to the haredi mass protest of a Supreme Court's ruling calling for the inclusion of non-Orthodox representatives on local religious councils, Shain said.

"That was quite a momentous moment... The two communities were separated by thousands of police officers... Danger was in the air."

As a result of these divisions within Israel, particularly with regards to the who-is-a-Jew conflict, "we were bound to have a conflict of interest between the homeland and American Jews," Shain said.

He noted that the who-is-a-Jew conflict has led some Americans to redirect funds from mainstream groups like United Jewish Appeal (UJA) to Israel-based Conservative and Reform groups and to organizations such as Peace Now and the New Israel Fund, which promote democracy and pluralism.

This is "a growing pattern" that is influencing the way UJA recruits supporters, Shain said. "UJA is taking care to emphasize that it supports religious diversity [in Israel]."

Tracing the changes in Israeli-American relations, he said that in the post-war era, American Jews integrated and assimilated into American society. "Zionism was a nuisance, even though [American] Jews supported the state."

Since the mid-'80s, he said, there has been a widening gap in relations between Israel and American Jews who see "Israel as a burden on the Jewish experience in America... Diaspora support for Israel is eroding."

Left-wing and liberal American Jews have become disenchanted with Israel under Benjamin Netanyahu, and the who-is-a-Jew conflict has further alienated them, creating a "meltdown" in relations, Shain said.

The adult study committee of the Adath Israel, Canadian Friends of TAU and the Canadian Overseas Student Program of TAU sponsored Shain's lecture.

Ominous assertion

Israel's Foreign Ministry last week formally asked the European Union (EU) to restrain their emissaries from meeting officials of the Palestinian Authority (PA) at Orient House in eastern Jerusalem. These meetings are clearly an attempt to confer quasi-diplomatic support on the PA claim to eastern Jerusalem and as such they violate both the Oslo and the Wye accords as nothing more than transparent efforts to alter the status of Jerusalem.

In response to the request by Israel, the EU, through the pen of German Ambassador Theodor Wallau, replied that they "have no intention of changing [their] custom regarding meetings in Jerusalem."

In other words, the Europeans will continue to meet with Faisal Husseini in Orient House, knowing full well the symbolism in doing so is rich with diplomatic significance for the Palestinians and a deliberate taunt to Israeli sensibilities. Israel's interpretation of the Jerusalem provisions of the peace documents are of no interest to the Europeans.

The European position on Orient House is purposefully undermining Israel's claim to an undivided capital.

But it is far worse than that.

Preceding the "sand-in-your-face" stance on Orient House in the EU's reply letter was a far more ominous assertion that purposefully undermines Israel's very claim to Jerusalem itself: "We reaffirm our stated position regarding the specific status of Jerusalem as a corpus separatum."

The Europeans are now publicly propagating the view that Jerusalem should be somehow outside of Israel; it belongs to the world and not to Israel. Moreover, by failing to distinguish between east and west Jerusalem, between old and new Jerusalem, the EU was advancing the case for the internationalization of the city, as they did in 1947 under the UN partition plan of Palestine.

Jews throughout the world should be both affronted and alarmed at Europe's decision to try to set back Jewish history and set down Jewish identity.

The government of Israel responded immediately to the EU. "We will not tolerate the city's redivision," said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. "We cannot accept [the European] position, which views Jerusalem as an extraterritorial area and that doesn't belong to the State of Israel. It is the heart, the very heart, of the Jewish people and the very heart of the State of Israel."

Jerusalem will not be an issue in the Israeli election campaign. All the candidates for the prime ministership agree that it will never be divided again. If the Jewish position is so resolute and so clear-cut on the redivision of the city, what then should we tell the EU regarding the repossession of the city?

We should tell them to stay away from Jerusalem.

Public hypocrisy, private hate

Iranian president Mohammed Khatami visited Italy last week on the first state visit to the west by an Iranian leader since the Islamic revolution of Ayatollah Khomeini in 1979. He met with Italy's prime minister and then with the Pope. Magnanimously before the clicking cameras of the media phalanx, Khatami suggested that it was now time to do away with terrorism and violence. Privately though, he reiterated to Italian leaders that Israel had no right to exist. Obviously, Khatami's new-found moderation gets clogged in his throat, stuck like a chicken bone in his hate-filled throat when it comes to the Jewish state.

Poses questions to Haredi writer

I refer to Reva Kaiser's article "Increasingly difficult to hear Haredi voice." (CJN, March 18)

I wonder if Reva is just naive, or is merely trying to publish propaganda for the Haredim. Does she really think that the "sea of black" filling the streets was there because there were no shuls in which to daven Minchah? Does she think the shofarim were blown to practise for Yom Kippur?

If Reva had witnessed Ghandi's march to the sea for salt, would she have written to the London Times about the lack of salt in India that was forcing the poor people to walk all that distance to harvest salt from the sea?

Ghandi shook the British Raj with his ability to rouse the people. What does she think the Haredim are attempting to do in Israel?

Independent young Jews have role to play

Lisa Abramovitz' Discovering Oneself article (Guest Voices, CJN, Feb. 25) makes a poignant statement about being a young Jew. Her difficulty in finding a place for herself as a non-conformist interested in changing the world has a resounding ring.

As one, who has herself, frequently felt like the square peg in the round hole, I know that there are many of us out there – artists, activists, reformists – living in locations and lifestyles that are not "typically" Jewish but dedicated to one of the fundamental tenets of Judaism, tikun olam, repair of the world. Many of us do not. And it's time we all recognized that fact and celebrated it.

In my journey, I frequently find Jewish individuals who for various reasons feel isolated from the larger Jewish community, feeling more at home with non-Jewish friends, mates, and spiritual activities. Terrific work is being done by such organizations as Kolel to help these people find their home within the Jewish community.

But we need do more. Only by recognition and inclusion of the full realm of how young Jewish people live and contribute their gifts to society, can we ensure that these people feel and continue being Jewish.

Differs with Benmergui's comments on Israel

Everyone is, of course, entitled to their own opinion regarding events in Israel, even if this entails criticism of the Israeli government or society. However, it is unfortunate when such criticisms are offered with an utter lack of sensitivity or understanding of the Israeli political landscape, as was done by Ralph Benmergui. (CJN, Feb. 25)

Among the number of debatable claims made by Benmergui, the most infuriating one perhaps, is the one where he denounces the violence in Israel and adds that "you know [the argument]; it's okay to blow that guy's head off on the cell phone because he's a bastard," an obvious reference to Hamas bomb maker Yehia Ayash, who was killed by Israel. Referring to Ayash, the suicide-bomb mastermind, as simply a "bastard" is a narrow-minded and poorly expressed observation at best, and a blatant and simplistic understatement nonetheless.

It appears that in his rush to judgment, Benmergui fails to realize that Ayash was not merely a "bastard," but rather a terrorist who orchestrated the murder of scores of civilians, and who was highly successful in his job, namely the slaughter of innocent people. His assassination could not only be justified on moral grounds, but even more so for "practical" reasons of self-defence, such as that his premature demise most likely prevented the death of many other innocent civilians.

Likes Michele Landsberg's views, but ...

Your (CJN, Feb. 25) issue featuring a picture of Michele Landsberg gives a fitting opportunity to comment on the woman and her work.

I say this more in sorrow than anger.

Opinions

Pollsters big winners in election

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Few people this month are taking solace in the fact that we have now passed the halfway mark in a seemingly endless election campaign. If most Israelis would prefer to get the whole thing over with now so as to spare themselves 10 more weeks of tedious politicking, it's not hard to guess who's most delighted by this insufferably long electoral season. Since the Knesset voted in December to stage national elections in May, the country's pollsters have been doing a bang-up business.

Admittedly, even when politicians aren't running for office, pollsters are rarely idle. It's a toss-up who's more enraptured by public opinion surveys – politicians or the media, both of whom commission polls with increasing frequency.

During the current campaign, the country's two largest Hebrew dailies compete for the most newsworthy opinion-poll results every Friday. To help boost sales of their fat, more expensive weekend editions, Yediot Ahronot and Ma'ariv publish survey results aimed at capturing readers and making headlines.

In recent weeks, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has been locked in a see-saw opinion-poll battle with Labor party leader Ehud Barak, his main challenger in the May 17 elections. Often on the same day, a Gallup Institute survey for Ma'ariv will show Netanyahu leading Barak by a percentage point or two while Yediot publishes a Dahaf poll indicating a Barak victory. Or vice-versa.

In Israel, as in many western countries, polls have become a multi-million-dollar industry and an inescapable part of public life. Politicians and their advisers, almost enslaved by polls, have come to depend on them.

Early this month, Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein ordered government ministers to not commission polls, except for purely professional reasons, until the elections.

Polling is hardly an exact science, but you'd never know it from the primacy given to opinion polls in Israeli politics and high-level planning. Despite their notorious unreliability, surveys are now a key part in government decision-making, having attained the status once reserved for top-secret intelligence reports.

"Public opinion surveys are playing an unprecedented important role in the management of affairs of state," Uzi Benziman wrote recently in Ha'aretz. "Not only do they gauge the public's mood and thereby serve as a legitimate assessment tool for both the national parties and the heads of political parties, they also determine what decisions are made."

Critics charge that surveys often distort reality with findings affected by several factors – the phrasing of questions posed to respondents; the expectation of those who commissioned the survey; the size of the sampling; and the manner in which the results are presented. The credibility of many polls is further strained by the fact that the main survey companies are hired by political parties and also serve the media in a potentially unholy alliance.

Some see polls in even more pernicious terms, insisting they have become a substitute for elections and undermine democracy by producing bandwagon or underdog effects. It's now a given of political science that published survey results affect voting behavior.

For their part, polling organizations say their work suffers from a public misunderstanding. They stress their independence and justify their polls as simply snapshots at a point in time of voter attitudes and intentions that are subject to change before voters reach the ballot-box.

Pollsters, who do most of their interviewing over the phone, rely heavily on phone directories for sampling purposes, thereby ignoring various sectors of the population underrepresented by such sources. As a result, the opinions of harder-to-reach groups such as soldiers, Arabs, Haredim and new immigrants are not sufficiently taken into account, without mentioning others who refuse to be questioned.

There's something vaguely reassuring that for all the high-priced sampling, data collection and response analysis used in countless polls ahead of election day, these modern-day successors to soothsayers and crystal-ball gazers often get it wrong.

In 1996, pollsters predicted Shimon Peres would defeat Netanyahu for the premiership. In 1993, surveys indicated that incumbent Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek would beat his challenger Ehud Olmert in the capital's municipal elections. In 1992, then prime minister Yitzhak Shamir enjoyed unprecedented popularity with polls showing him easily vanquishing any candidate Labor could field.

If recent elections are any indication, pollsters may well be eating humble pie for breakfast on May 18.

Israel's hidden Jewish renaissance

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In terms of religious practice, the image of Israel is still one of a country and people sharply divided between two distinct camps, with very little in common. The militant secularists appear to be on one side of the divide, rejecting all aspects of religious practice and teaching their children very little of Jewish tradition and culture. The Haredim stand on the other side, rigidly rejecting any middle ground.

This image was reinforced recently when hundreds of thousands of Haredim gathered in Jerusalem, ostensibly to protest the rulings of the secular Supreme Court on issues of religious practice. On the other side of the street, literally, stood thousands of secularists, protesting what they view as religious coercion by the Haredim. The gap seems huge and increasing, particularly in the context of an overheated Israeli political system.

However, as in so many other cases, the television clips and front-page photos exaggerate the conflict and hide the real changes that are taking place out of the headlines. For those who live in Israel, or visit long enough to look behind the facade, a dramatic and positive revolution in Jewish life is taking place.

This renaissance is primarily the product of Israel's "modern Orthodox" community, and the cultural and religious networks that have been created.

In the past 50 years, millions of children have grown up speaking Hebrew as their mother tongue, allowing them to develop a depth of understanding that is unparalleled over the past 2,000 years. They have direct access to all the resources of Jewish culture, from the Bible through the Talmud and later commentaries. Instead of leaving the interpretation to a narrow elite, this process is creating an explosion in Jewish learning and knowledge, whose impact is only beginning to be understood.

The direct access of so many Israelis to their cultural heritage has also led to a growing degree of religious pluralism in Israel. The stark image of two polarized camps – haredi and ultra-secular – is no longer accurate, and in many communities, the range of Jewish practice is growing broader. In Jerusalem, in addition to the numerous haredi groups, there are women's minyanim (prayer groups), Conservative and Reform synagogues, groups which emphasize singing through the services (inspired by the late Shlomo Carlebach), and others, all within walking distance of each other. Bet Shmuel, the Reform movement's centre in Jerusalem, and the Conservative movement's Bet Agron offer a wide program in Jewish texts, history and tradition to secular Israelis who only now realize how they and their parents were robbed of their tradition by a militant and intolerant secular leadership.

It is true that this activity is generating intense opposition from the religious "establishment," including the haredi political and religious leadership. These hierarchies and interest groups still control the formal institutions that register marriages and divorces, and they allocate public funding from the anachronistic Ministry of Religious Affairs. They can and often do pose unnecessary difficulties (not justified by and often in violation of the spirit of Jewish law) to those who need their services, but they are powerless to prevent alternative groups from forming and running their own activities. Wherever enough people gather together to form a synagogue, minyan, or study circle, they do not need approval from anyone. The rigid establishment is fighting against the tide, and their rulings are relevant only to those who voluntarily accept their authority.

The pluralism and renaissance in Jewish learning includes the high schools and universities, yeshivot, kibbutzim, research institutes, and most importantly, informal study groups in Israel. This renaissance has also spread to the Jewish centres of North America, Europe and Australia, through constant interaction and extensive travel.

Dozens of high-quality Internet sites provide a means of exchanging ideas and interpretations. This process is entirely unregulated; anyone can put a commentary on the World Wide Web, and in the spirit of pluralism and the free marketplace of ideas, the best ones will be picked up and their impact will grow.

This renaissance is still limited to Jerusalem and a few other smaller cities (Petach Tikva, Rehovot, Raanana, Kfar Saba), but it is gathering momentum. Even in the heart of secular Tel Aviv, secular intellectuals have begun to attend lectures on Jewish issues. The divide still exists, but the number of bridges are growing.

The founders of modern Zionism had two goals: to build a state to assure physical survival; and in this context, to revive the religion and culture to assure spiritual rebirth. During the first 50 years of Israeli existence, the focus was on achieving the first objective. However, the growing security created conditions for a religious and cultural renaissance. If properly nurtured, this can provide the basis for the real revival of the Jewish people.

How much has Germany changed?

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Now that the civil century is about to breathe its last, it has become a widespread practice to look back and point out the achievements and/or failures that humanity has experienced during that time.

Statistics show that the 20th century has been the bloodiest in human history, with Nazi Germany the main culprit for World War II and the Holocaust, and scourges that have produced no fewer than 50 million dead.

It is well to ask whether, during the last 50 years, a new Germany has indeed replaced the old.

There are those who will answer that the past was so terrible that nothing can blot it out. But that is not the question. Rather, one must ask whether today's Germany, as we have come to know it in the second half of the century, has radically changed from the one that stained the '30s and '40s.

The answer is clearly in the affirmative. In many ways the new chancellor, Gerhard Schroeder, symbolizes the change, in that he is the first German chancellor who did not experience World War II and the Holocaust. Born in 1944, he knows Nazism only from the reports of others. He himself represents in many ways the new Germany. He and his generation were not responsible for what happened then, and he is determined to make sure that the past will not repeat itself. He is amongst those who want to settle debts that so far have not been compensated, and he has prevailed on the 12 largest banks and businesses in the country to set up a fund of some $2 billion for those who suffered slave labor under private businesses during World War II.

In trying to make amends, Germany leads all countries that were somehow involved with Nazi atrocities. It has paid more in reparations (some $60 billion) and has put more of its own citizens on trial for war crimes. It is noteworthy that most of the accused are, in fact, German citizens or institutions.

Finally also, the endless discussions about a proper Holocaust memorial to be erected in Berlin are coming to a conclusion and now await the assent of the Bundestag. In a way, this will mark the end of a terrible era and signal that the new one has indeed made its mark.

An article by Tina Rosenberg in the New York Times, concludes: "Germans are once again debating how much guilt people today must bear for the past. Except for a handful of old men, the answer is 'none.' But all Germans have a special responsibility for the future, to maintain democracy and deepen tolerance. This is how Germany must now be judged."

True, agitation against "others" will still surface in the country from time to time and especially in the eastern part of Germany, where unemployment is large and the experience with democracy is only 10 years old. In this respect, Germany is unfortunately not alone. Ethnic prejudice exists elsewhere as well. We, in Canada, cannot boast of total innocence either.

The Kirshner File

A distinguished Israeli journalist looks back

The year was 1980 and the place was Cairo. Shmuel (Samuel) Segev, one of Israel's most distinguished journalists, was interviewing Anwar Sadat, the president of Egypt and the first Arab leader to sign a peace treaty with Israel.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

During a pause in their three-hour interview, Sadat asked Segev whether he knew the cause of Gamal Abdel Nasser's untimely death. Nasser, who preceded Sadat, ruled Egypt for some 16 years until his sudden death in 1970.

Before Segev could reply, Sadat, his eyes twinkling, told a joke. "The phone in Nasser's office rang. It was Golda Meir (the Israeli prime minister). 'Let's make love, not war,' she declared. Upon hearing this, Nasser instantly had a fatal heart attack."

Segev chuckled, savoring a moment of levity in a long career as a foreign correspondent where the topics at hand usually left little room for flippancy.

Until his retirement in 1990, Segev was a star reporter for Ma'ariv, the Tel Aviv-based daily. He joined the newspaper in 1957, then spent the next three decades travelling around the world.

Being a specialist in diplomatic affairs, Segev covered the Arab-Israeli conflict, as well as Israel's bilateral relations with a host of countries. The net result was that Segev acquired an immense storehouse of knowledge and got to know every Israeli decision-maker from David Ben-Gurion onward.

Segev's erudition was not only apparent in his reportage, but in his books, whose topics run the gamut from Israel's role in the Iran-Contra affair to the secret immigration of Moroccan Jews to Israel.

Retired though he may be, Segev is hardly resting on his laurels. In 1998, St. Martin's Press published his latest book, Crossing the Jordan, which deals with the peace process, past and present.

And now Segev, a sixth-generation Israeli who divides his time between Toronto (his wife is a Canadian), New York City and Tel Aviv, is working on two new books – the peace process under Benjamin Netanyahu and Israel's on-again, off-again negotiations with Syria from 1992 to 1996.

He also teaches two courses at Hofstra University in Hempstead, N.Y., on Mideast politics and the media in Israel and the Arab world.

Of Moroccan origin, Segev was born in Tiberias, the son of a carpenter whose ancestors arrived in Palestine from Meknes in 1840. During the War of Independence, Segev fought with the Haganah, then worked in military intelligence. This background in and appreciation of espionage proved useful when he wrote a book about Israeli master spy Eli Cohen.

For several months after the 1956 Suez war, Segev served as Israel's assistant military governor in the occupied Gaza Strip. He has vivid memories of Gaza. He wrote the letter of surrender, in Hebrew and Arabic, for the Egyptian commander of the Eighth Division. And for a few days, he roomed with a captured Egyptian general who had presided at the trial of the Israeli spies apprehended in connection with the 1954 Lavon affair.

Segev, who holds a BA in Middle Eastern studies from Tel Aviv University, joined Ma'ariv fresh from his last post in the army as a media relations expert.

He was the newspaper's Paris bureau chief in 1958-59 and again in 1962-63, when Israel's relationship with France was unusually close. He sensed even then that the honeymoon between Israel and France would not last much longer.

As part of his duties, he covered France's colonial war in Algeria. When Algeria declared independence, the foreign minister told him that Algeria would join the Arab League and not recognize Israel.

In 1964, Segev went to Addis Ababa as Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie's information advisor. "Ethiopia was losing the propaganda war in Africa over the Ogaden war, and my job was to present Ethiopia's case to the international media." His first "convert" was James Reston of The New York Times.

Segev also covered the war in Vietnam, and wrote what he says was the only book in Hebrew about the subject.

In another plum assignment, Segev was Ma'ariv's bureau chief in Washington from 1971 to 1976, a period punctuated by the Yom Kippur War and its aftermath and the still unsolved assassination of his friend, Joe Allon, the Israeli military attache.

Segev talked with Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's ambassador to the United States, every day. "He confided in me. I knew things even his own staff didn't. It was embarrassing, because his people would ask, 'Shmulik, what's going on?'"

He greatly respected Rabin's understanding of geo-politics. When Rabin was defence minister in the 1984 to 1990 national unity government, he voted in favor of assassinating Abu Jihad, Yasser Arafat's second-in-command. "He favored the operation because he thought it would be easier some day for Israel to negotiate with Arafat rather than with Abu Jihad."

Segev visited Iran regularly prior to the 1979 Islamic revolution, and was on the last El Al flight out of Teheran in January of that year. "No one," he observed, "expected Iran to go so far as to break diplomatic ties with Israel."

He claims that Israel's intelligence agencies never grasped the full extent of the PLO's links with the Iranian opposition which unseated the pro-Western monarchy. Segev can foresee a resumption of Israeli-Iranian relations if the forces of liberalization in Iran prevail.

In 1980, Segev was the first Israeli journalist to establish a permanent bureau in Cairo. But he actually made his first trip to Cairo in 1977, shortly after Sadat's historic trip to Israel. Initially, all doors were closed to him, given the suspicion in which Israel was held. There was an improvement after his interview with Sadat, but the Egyptian intellectual elite continued to shun him.

The "cold peace" which has characterized Israel's relations with Egypt from the outset was, he believes, inevitable. "Egypt never accepted the fact that a small country like Israel could play a regional role, sometimes at its own expense. Egypt wants Israel back to its 'natural size.'"

Israeli journalism has changed considerably since Segev's days as a young reporter. "From 1957 to 1973, security considerations and national interests guided the press. After the Yom Kippur War, the Israeli media turned more aggressive, and investigative reporting became more important." To his regret, the Israeli press today is too fixated with entertaining rather than informing its readers. In his view, this trend began about 10 years ago.

Shmuel (Samuel) Segev

Turning to current Israeli politics, Segev predicted that Ehud Barak would defeat Netanyahu in the May 17 election. "Likud has disintegrated, while the Labor party remains united under Barak." The centrist party, led by Yitzhak Mordechai, will win upwards of 10 Knesset seats, and will probably join Barak's government. "Barak will be an excellent prime minister," said Segev, whose sympathies lie with the Labor party.

Segev is not one to denigrate Netanyahu, perhaps Israel's most demonized prime minister. "He made two contributions to the peace process. He slowed it down. This was important because Israel needs territorial cards to play in final status talks. And he enshrined the principle of reciprocity, a basic element now accepted by the United States and the international community."

However, he said, under Netanyahu's watch, the peace process ultimately fell apart. Barak, Segev is convinced, will put it back together again.

English language classes add to Israel experience

By FERN WESTERNOFF and THERESA YOUNG

Guest Voices

As we volunteered to teach English in Israel for two weeks with the Yad BeYad program, we knew that travelling together as a Jew and a Christian would bring a richness to our experiences in the Holy Land.

No travel article or book prepared us for the tapestry we were about to weave.

Yad BeYad is a summer program that brings volunteers from Canada and the United States to various locations in Israel for two-week periods. Volunteers teach English to immigrants, thereby helping them upgrade their skills and giving them an important asset in the workplace.

Participating in this program allowed us to use our training as speech-language pathologists to contribute to the growth of Israel. Many of our fellow volunteers were neither teachers nor language professionals, and came from a variety of backgrounds.

We taught and lived in an absorption centre in Tiberias. Our students were mainly a mix of émigrés from South America, Europe, and Russia. One of our classes was a beginner's class, while the other was slightly more advanced. The students were an interesting mix of young and old, professionals and students.

Tiona, a librarian, acted as our Israeli hostess, making us mint tea and coffee to go with her baked goods during breaks. Alexander, a doctor from Russia, responded to emergency calls on his cell phone during class. Luba and Diego chattered incessantly in Spanish, and when separated, pretended to call each other on their cell phones. Yizhak told us that he was learning English "to meet women like you."

Before our departure, we had several training sessions with teachers who had also been Yad BeYad volunteers. Along with the activities and materials from our training sessions, we tried to create interesting and engaging activities for our students. We planned a number of joint class activities including games, exercises, and a closing party.

Because we were dealing with adults, we tried to be flexible, and adjusted our teaching to our students' needs and learning styles.

By the end of our two-week period, we had bonded so strongly with our students that it was difficult for us to turn them over to the next set of teachers when we left.

We were deeply touched by those we met at every step of the way. It began with the wonderful people involved in the Yad BeYad organization who led us hand in hand to Tiberias. It extended to the other volunteer teachers from Toronto, Montreal and Tulsa, and the staff at the absorption centre where we lived. It also involved the Israeli volunteer families who offered assistance, invited us into their homes for Shabbat dinner, and walked with us on the ancient cobblestone paths of historic and religious sites.

Above all, we were touched by our students who arrived at class five days a week with an eagerness to learn, despite having just completed a full day of work or study. They even used their beginning English to try to convince us to make aliyah.

Other highlights of the Yad BeYad program were day trips to a number of exciting destinations and a weekend tour of Jerusalem. At the Western Wall on Shabbat, we were moved to tears amidst the aura of the many prayers recited and folded into its crevices.

Fern realized her dream of reading her Haftorah and completing a spiritual bat mitzvah.

We walked up the hill on which Jesus delivered the sermon on the Mount, while reading these passages.

As we struggled in the midday heat, the Greek Israeli man by the Church of the Beatitudes gave us cold water, food, and a place to rest in his shade, providing for us as if we were living the words of the sermon.

Theresa's early morning treks through the maze of near empty streets to attend mass at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre were treasured moments.

Recognition of the diversity among people within and across faiths served to break down stereotypes.

We wove our Christian and Jewish perspectives together into a fabric of biblical stories and historical information, threaded with recollections, connections and juxtapositions that sometimes overflowed into wellsprings of emotion from our spiritual cores.

The people we met added splashes of color and texture, rich tapestries, Jacquards and florals – reflecting what they shared– as our lives fleetingly connected in ways that drew our hearts together.

As we planted the seeds of English among our students, the Yad BeYad organizers planted trees in our name to thank us for our contribution. We came away from this experience with a lifetime's worth of memories, and were touched to leave something of ourselves behind.

Jewish Life

The path to Judaism

Turbulent Souls: A Catholic Son's Return To His Family*, by Stephen Dubner (William Morrow and Company $32.50).

Books
Bernard Baskin

At the heart of this affecting family memoir is the story of how a one-time Catholic altar boy found his way to Judaism.

Stephen, the youngest of eight children, was reared in a fervent religious atmosphere on a small farm in upstate New York. His parents, Florence and Solomon (later Veronica and Paul) had converted to Catholicism more than 20 years before he was born. They were unswerving in their faith and devotion to Catholic beliefs and causes. All the children were named after Catholic saints. The family was poor, but largely removed from the dangerous secular influences of the outside community.

When the author gradually became interested in his Jewish antecedents, he learned of the loneliness and family estrangements that had led his parents to move from second-generation inner-city traditional Judaism to what they felt to be the all-encompassing warmth and satisfying teachings of a new faith. Sol's family sat shivah for him, and almost all family ties were severed.

What motivated young Stephen to find meaning in Judaism? He credits "the cunning of history," but a charismatic Jewish drama teacher and his involvement with a close associate of the Lubavitcher Rebbe were less mysterious influences.

His first visit to a small Orthodox synagogue was disturbing. The service was baffling. The congregation stood, bowed, prayed – no one in unison – all in a strange and unfamiliar tongue.

But he was transformed when the Torah was brought out. "Suddenly, all the jabbering was reduced to an appreciative murmur...The bulky Torah scroll, swaddled in its glittering cover like a child of royalty, was liberated from the ark and escorted down the aisle by an old man struggling happily beneath its weight, and as the men and boys up front hurried to greet it, pressing the fringes of their prayer shawls to its cover and kissing the fringes, I tumbled into a bone-deep understanding. I too threw myself at the Torah, awkwardly scraping it with my fingers, lifting my fingers to my lips. A resonance – a gratefulness, a relief – blistered its way inside me: It is the Book they are venerating here. They are not eating the Body and drinking the Blood of the Christ, that sad-faced messenger and martyr of my youth."

The second portion of the book concerns the author's desire to understand his late father, and to come to terms with his mother who is unwilling to accept Judaism as a valid religion. He visits a Catholic cemetery intending to recite the Kaddish over his father's grave. Instead "I told him I was ready to stop being angry about his leaving me here without him, his secrets unexplained. I told him I wished I could have gotten to know him better. Before I left, I dug up a small stone and placed it on his grave marker. I didn't regret not having said Kaddish. Would I want some son of mine reciting the Rosary over my grave when I'm lying in a Jewish cemetery."

Eventually, Stephen, with the help of John Cardinal O'Connor of New York, reaches out in friendship and reconciliation to the far flung members of his Jewish and Catholic families.

The author, now 35, is a writer and editor for the New York Times magazine. For him, becoming a Jew, involves study, the beginning of religious observance, new connections and areas of awareness. Perhaps above all, the need to resist the kind of religious fanaticism that marked his Catholic childhood and adolescence.

This is a sensitive, engrossing, often painful account of a spiritual excursion by a baal tshuvah who in the end achieves meaningful ties with both his past and his new faith.

Passover sites for kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Why is the holiday called "Passover?"

(a) Because the Israelites had to pass over the Nile to leave Egypt. (b) The angel of death passed over Egypt and killed all the first-born. (c) Or because at Pesach, the spaghetti must be finished and the pasta over.

That's just one of the many Pesach quiz questions found on the Jewish Highway. The World Wide Web is full of puzzles, games, songs and coloring books to help kids gear up for the big holiday. Today, some of the best.

A great place to start is at Virtual Jerusalem's Pesach Parade [http://www.vjholidays.com/pessach/parade.htm]. That's where you'll find the answer to the quiz mentioned above. There's also a children's Haggadah, holiday recipes for kids and an animated video about Passover [http://www.vjholidays.com/pessach/jtn.htm]. You will need to register for a free password in order to gain access to some of the Virtual Jerusalem pages.

My favorite Passover site for kids is Nurit Reshef's From Pesach to Shavuot [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/pesach/pesachframes.html]. (You will need a browser that can handle Java in order to enjoy this site.) Reshef has created a "four-room" virtual playhouse. In the library, for example, you can listen to stories in Hebrew and English, learn about the history of the holiday, click on an online Seder plate and create some silly holiday stories. When you get to the playroom, try the holiday word search, or complete the onscreen jigsaw puzzle. And don't forget to play (and win) Passover Tic-Tac-Toe against the dumbest computer in the world.

Is your child making his or her singing debut at this year's seder? They can brush up on their rendition of Ma Nishtana at Passover Tunes for Kids [http://www.613.org/kidpassover.html] and Nurit Reshef's site [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/pesach/audiomusicroom.html]. And they can sing along with instrumental versions of the songs at Classic Passover Tunes [http://www.kosher4passover.com/tunes.htm].

Budding young artists may want to check out a couple of Passover coloring books they can print and then decorate. The Diaspora Yeshiva pages focus on the steps of the seder [http://www.mznet.org/holidays/seder/seder.htm], while Torah Tots also has pages illustrating the story of Pesach and the Ten Plagues [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/pesach/pescolor.htm].

For more kids' pages, check out the quizzes at the Department of Jewish Education [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/pesgnen.html].

Billy Bear's Pesach Holiday has some mazes (Help Moses find the Ten Commandments; Help the people cross the Red Sea) [http://billybear4kids2.simplenet.com/holidays/pesach/pesach.htm].

Torah Tots does a great job at retelling the story of Passover, in addition to a generous supply of games like Puzzling Plagues and Word Find.

Another amusing game encourages you to search for any chametz which may be hiding on your computer screen [http://www.anshe.org/chometz.htm]. With a few deft clicks of the mouse, you are chametz-free.

If only cleaning the real stuff were that easy!

Mazon launches new fundraiser to fight hunger

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Continuing a trend that began with its first year of allocations in 1987, Mazon Canada continues to raise ever-increasing amounts for food banks across Canada. Next week it will introduce a new fundraising vehicle that could push the sums even higher.

On March 22, Mazon Canada will launch its first-ever Kosher Gourmet Gala at Roy Thomson Hall. The gala, which will run from 6:30 to 9:00 p.m, will bring together under one roof more than 20 caterers, restaurateurs and other purveyors of kosher food and drink. Tickets for the gala begin at $50 per person. Sponsors donations are available at $1,000, patrons, $500 and friends, $250.

"We are expecting several hundred persons to attend and enjoy the beautifully decorated food and wine stations," said Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, Mazon's executive director. "An enthusiastic team of volunteers, caterers, wine and food suppliers are working hard to make this event a big financial success, enabling Mazon to expand its donor base and channel even more funds into the fight against hunger," she said.

Among the caterers and masters of kosher culinary artistry participating in the gala are: Peter Graben Fine Foods; Linda Morganstern Cakes; Levy's Catering; Tri Elm Catering; King Solomon's Table; Strub's Pickles; and Sam Firestone Caterers.

"Toronto is home to some very gifted kosher chefs," said Rose Reisman, honorary chair of the event. "The kosher gourmet gala offers members of the community an opportunity to try samplings of beautifully prepared food, and taste some award-winning wines."

The gala is patterned after the Montreal Food Fest. All proceeds will benefit Mazon Canada, which raises funds within the Jewish community and distributes them to front-line agencies that provide relief from hunger.

Since its inception in 1986, Mazon has continually increased the sums it has allocated. In 1998, it distributed $149,550 in its spring round of allocations and $232,400 – a record – in the fall. Last year's allocations of $381,950 brings Mazon's accumulated total since 1987 to $1,621,445.

The sums ranged from $250 (to Christ Church Cathedral in Montreal) to $5,000 (Jewish Women International in Vancouver). Among the agencies receiving support from Mazon are: Gander (Nfld.) and Area Food Bank ($1,500); Food Bank Moncton NB ($2,500); Centre d'Entraide d'Argueteuil, Lachute, Que. ($1,000); Jewish Child and Family Services, Winnipeg ($2,500); and the Fort McMurray (Alta.) Food Bank Association ($2,500).

For more information about the gala or to make a donation, Mazon can be reached at 788 Marlee Avenue, Suite 301, Toronto, Ont., M6B 3K1 or by telephone at 783-7554.

Long-distance carrier to aid Sunnybrook chapel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An up-and-coming telecommunications company is hoping Ontario's Jewish community will soon get that long distance feeling.

APC Telecommunications Inc. of Vaughan has signed a deal with the Sunnybrook Jewish Chapel, designating the small synagogue its sales agent to the dozens of Jewish organizations, synagogues and charities in the province.

The company says the arrangement could be a major revenue generator for the Jewish community's myriad of organizations.

Under the terms of the deal, APC will rebate four percent of monthly long-distance charges, to be split evenly between the Sunnybrook chapel and every new customer the chapel signs up.

Individuals who sign on with APC's long-distance service save on their bills and become donors. Two percent of their monthly long-distance charges will be returned to the chapel, and two percent will go to the organization, charity or synagogue that signed them up.

"It's a win-win," enthused Rabbi Barry Schneider, spiritual leader of the Sunnybrook chapel, where patients and veterans who live at the Sunnybrook Health Science Centre attend services. "It will guarantee us a bottom line so we can fund our programs."

The agreement will raise thousands of dollars for the chapel, Rabbi Schneider estimated.

Those associated with the chapel will also sell APC's prepaid calling cards.

The deal with the Jewish community is "groundbreaking," said Larry Hunt, president of APC Telecommunications.

He said he credits his brother for the idea. Bob Hunt, a United Church minister, is head of chaplaincy at Sunnybrook, and he connected APC with the Jewish chapel.

"We're very excited about it," said Larry Hunt. "It's great for us to put something back into the community. The benefits could be huge."

APC, which started operations last June, is a publicly traded company and guarantees the lowest long-distance rates. It says it already has the lowest rates to Israel of any of the three largest long-distance providers.

The company has plans to expand into the rapidly growing Internet market. It may be reached at 207-0046 or toll-free [illegible]272-1225.

U of T's medical dean prepares to leave post

Academia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Dr. Arnold (Arnie) Aberman has a glittering resume, but to him modesty has its own virtues.

"My dad – my role model and the person with the biggest influence on my life – taught me that there's no end to the good you can do if you let other people take the credit," he said. "That's wise advice, and I've tried to remember it."

Aberman, the outgoing dean of the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine, therefore grows somewhat ornery when he is asked to list his main accomplishments as dean.

"I have 4,426 faculty members, so I don't like to personalize my achievements," he said, noting that this was the first lengthy interview he had granted since becoming dean.

But when the question was rephrased, he perked up and the words flowed. "So many exciting things have happened in the past five, six years," said Aberman, a specialist in intensive care, internal medicine and pulmonary disease.

Under his stewardship, the faculty has formed closer bonds with Toronto teaching hospitals, including the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Mount Sinai, where he was physician-in-chief from 1977 to 1987.

Aberman, a 55-year-old Montrealer, pointed out that Toronto has some of the finest teaching hospitals in North America.

And under Aberman's direction, the faculty recently unveiled the Surgical Skills Centre at Mount Sinai, the first of its kind in Canada, and has set its sights on building a Centre for Cellular and Biomolecular Research and a health sciences facility.

Aberman, too, has renewed the faculty's commitment to campus-based research, for which the U of T is historically famous.

In this century, U of T researchers have made seminal medical advances in the discovery of insulin, the development of the cardiac pacemakers and the first electronic pacemaker and the invention of Pablum infant cereal. In addition, the first single-lung transplant and nerve transplant were performed by surgeons affiliated with the university.

More recently, U of T research teams identified the T-cell receptor gene, which plays an essential role in the body's immune system. And for good measure, they cloned the cystic fibrosis gene.

Dr. Arnold (Arnie) Aberman

Beyond all that, Aberman derives great satisfaction from having recruited dozens of new instructors, thereby invigorating the faculty, the largest and top-rated in Canada.

"I look for energy and optimism when I hire people," he said. "That's what impresses me." Why optimism? "You have to think you can make a difference."

Clearly, Aberman has made a difference, according to a report issued last week by the U of T's provost.

Citing Aberman's leadership skills, the provost also commended him for his "transparent financial management" skills, his strategic planning efforts and his support and encouragement of research. "Dean Aberman," he concluded, "leaves the faculty in a remarkably strong position."

Founded in 1843, the U of T's medical faculty not only produces doctors – an estimated 1,200 during the Aberman era – but also offers programs in such fields as physical therapy, occupational therapy, biomedical communications and speech-language pathology.

These courses are in popular demand, and at present, the faculty has some 4,500 undergraduate, post-graduate and graduate students.

"I've been very proud to be dean," said Aberman, who steps down on June 30. "It has been a labor of love, not a job.

"As a doctor, you can help a group of patients," he added. "But as an academic physician, you can teach hundreds of doctors and thus influence medical care."

When he retires, Aberman, who usually works 16 hours a day, seven days a week, has no intention of fading away quietly. "I want to write and teach," he said. An international lecturer, he sits on the board of Vancouver's Fraser Institute and regularly composes op-ed pieces on topics ranging from health care to agricultural marketing boards.

A small-L libertarian with a strong interest in politics and economics, he was born in Montreal. His father, Jack, a Polish immigrant and the proprietor of Rainbow Dress, manufactured wedding gowns. His mother, Ethel, was instrumental in Jack's success. She bore three girls (Rosalie, a retired psychiatric hospital chief executive officer; Myrna, a travel agent; and Susan, a catering company executive) and one son besides Aberman (Zave, a property developer).

A graduate of Talmud Torah and of Northmount High School, he scored 89.3 percent on his Grade 11 province-wide matriculation exams. "I was always a good student," he said."Being smart is a dime a dozen. But what counts is what you do with your life."

Aberman had definite goals, and was drawn to medicine. "My family valued scholarship, and they encouraged me to become educated, though I don't recall any pressure from them to be a doctor."

Aberman one of first intensive care specialists

Medicine also seemed appealing, he said, because, as a child, he looked up to his family physician, the legendary Alton Goldbloom. And once he got to McGill, he was curious to find out more about the workings of the human body.

After graduating from McGill, he was a resident in internal medicine at the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal and the Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York City. Being ambitious, he continued his studies at the Cardiovascular Research Institute of the University of California and at the Shock Research Unit of the University of Southern California.

In the early 1970s, he was one of the first Canadian doctors to specialize in intensive care. There were only four such specialists in those days.

Aberman said he was attracted to academic medicine because of the mentors he had at McGill – Martin Hoffman and Bernie Cooper.

"These doctors," he explained, "seemed to know the most about medicine. And, as an academic doctor, I felt I'd be in the forefront of the profession."

Aberman returned to Canada at the behest of his wife, Janis, who thought it would be a better place than the United States to raise a family. "As usual, she was right." The Abermans have three children, all of whom live in New York City: Robert, an investment banker; Michael, who is training to be a doctor; and Leslie, a law student.

After his stint as Mount Sinai's physician-in-chief, Aberman was briefly associate dean of fiscal affairs at the University of Toronto. Then, from 1989 until 1992, he was both physician-in-chief at the Toronto Hospital and chair of the university's department of medicine, where he had taught since 1980.

In December 1992, he became the second Jew after Frederick Hans Lowy (1980-1987) to be chosen dean of the faculty of medicine. In 1994, he increased his administrative burden by assuming the post of vice-provost for relations with health care institutions.

He and his wife founded a publishing company in 1969, printing the indexes of medical literature. "I saw a need and started a business like any entrepreneur." He closed the firm in 1986 when he realized that he could not be a publisher and a doctor.

Aberman, who considers himself a committed member of Toronto's Jewish community, has visited Israel several times and lectured at the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem and the Rambam Hospital in Haifa. Based on what he has seen, he believes that Israeli and Canadian medicine are on an equal level.

When he is at leisure, Aberman enjoys skiing. But he reserves his real passion for reading, mainly history and current affairs. "I love it," he said with a twinkle in his eyes.

Don't back Palestinian state, CIC asks Ottawa

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is being asked to withhold recognition of a new Palestinian state if Yasser Arafat goes ahead with his intention of a unilateral declaration of independence in May 1999.

The request is being made March 23 to Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy in Ottawa, by the Canada-Israel Committee.

The commttee's views will be presented to the minister at a meeting in his office.

"Our view is that that there should be no unilateral declaration of independence unless it is negotiated with the contesting parties to the Oslo agreement," Harold Brief, Israel Affairs chair, told an executive meeting of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region March 11.

Brief said Arafat has indicated he will declare an independent Palestinian state by May 29 if all issues under the Oslo agreement are not resolved.

In other matters, the Ontario government will be asked at a meeting in about 10 days to have health services for disadvantaged students come under the Ministry of Community and Social Services instead of the Ministry of Education, the executive was told.

There is a greater chance that students at Jewish day schools and at other independent religious schools will get the services they need if such a transfer is made, Henry Koschitzky told the executive. He is chair of the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education.

Premier Mike Harris has told the congress that health services now restricted to public and Catholic schools should be available to all students.

Survivor fashions himself into expert on Holocaust

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Isaak Rudnicki, life has come full circle.

Born in Sviencionys, Poland (now in Lithuania), Rudnicki's life was turned upside down by the Holocaust. At 16, he left home to join a partisan unit and fight the Nazis in the forests of Eastern Europe.

Today at age 72, the primary focus of his attention is the Nazi war against the Jews in Eastern Europe. He is currently completing a mammoth 1,000-page study on the Holocaust in the former Soviet Union which he hopes to publish later this year.

In between fighting the Nazis and documenting their atrocities, Rudnicki immigrated to Israel, joined the Haganah underground and fought in Israel's War of Independence.

Like many other European Jews, he "Hebraicized" his name (to Yitshak Arad) and rose through the ranks of the Israel Defence Force (IDF). He ended his military career in 1972 with the rank of Brigadier General, serving as the IDF's chief educational officer.

A short, wiry man with a crop of curly salt and pepper hair, Arad was in Toronto last week to testify as an expert witness in the case involving alleged Nazi collaborator and Trawniki guard Wasyl Odynsky. Arad traced the history of the Nazi genocide in Poland and the role played by the Trawniki and Poniatowa labor camps.

For Arad, testifying in war crimes is far from a novel experience. Over the years, various courts have sought his expertise on the Holocaust. He testified early in the John Demjanjuk case in Israel and in the Alexander Lileikis denaturalization case in the United States. He was slated to testify in the Antanas Kenstavicius case in Vancouver but was never called upon after the alleged collaborator died on the first day of trial.

Since he began studying history and political science while still in the IDF, Arad has been drawn to the Holocaust. He could have focused on more typical topics like the legacy of Catharine the Great, he acknowledged, but "I felt I had an obligation to my own people."

His PhD dissertation, Ghetto in Flames, examined the fate of the Jews of Vilna.

He also penned an autobiography, The Partisan: From the Valley of Death to Mount Zion as well as one of the few books that looked at some of the lesser-known extermination camps: Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka: The Operation Reinhard Death Camps.

Yitshak Arad

"I'm the first to do a record on the three death camps," he said. "I found it was an unstudied area of the Holocaust."

He first realized that those Poland-based death camps were understudied, in the 1970s, while he was serving as chair of the Yad Vashem Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority. He held that position from 1972 to 1993.

Slated to make a presentation to an international conference on wartime Jewish resistance at Treblinka and Sobibor, he learned that little work had been done on the topic. Furthermore, there were few survivors to tell their stories. Only 150 Jews who passed through Belzec, Majdanek, Sobibor and Treblinka saw liberation. There is only one known survivor of Belzec, he said.

Able to speak several East European languages, Arad visited archives in Russia, Poland and Israel. Though his focus was on the larger German death camps, his studies included Trawniki, an SS training facility that provided manpower for other camps.

Trawniki men, drawn from Ukrainian volunteers, served in Treblinka and other extermination camps and helped suppress the Warsaw Ghetto uprising of April-May 1943, he said.

Emotionally wrenching

Today, the focus of his studies are the Einsatzgruppen, mobile SS killing squads that wiped out whole Jewish communities in the Soviet Union. Studying German and Russian archives, Arad's next books should be a comprehensive look at their activities.

As a survivor of the Nazis himself, he acknowledges the work can be emotionally wrenching. "For the last few years, when I read again and again the description of the testimonies and the killings, it is harder and harder. You don't get used to it.

"When I was younger, I tried to not be touched by it. I tried to build a wall around it. As I get older, I get more emotional."

Now a grandfather himself, "when I read about children being murdered, you look at your grandchildren and wonder about the feelings of the grandparents going with them to their deaths," he said.

Despite his emotions, he pledges to continue his work. "I feel, as a survivor, some obligation to the destroyed Jewish world from where I came...to my family that perished in the Holocaust, to my friends in the underground and the partisans who did not survive," he said.

CORRECTION

In the story, "Calgary, Atlantic provinces host Jewish students (CJN, March 11), Michael Soberman was incorrectly identified. He is Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's director of community services and youth activities. The CJN regrets the error.

Odynsky's guard unit shot Jews, court told

Ukrainian guards who pursued and shot escaping Jews.

Arad said the SS who commanded the camps, performed administrative duties and that it was Ukrainian auxiliaries who manned the watchtowers, performed guard duty and who did the shooting.

At one point, Armstrong read portions of Odynsky's examination for discovery, a pre-trial interview, in which the alleged Nazi collaborator said he doesn't know what he would have done if he'd seen Jews attempting to leave the camp.

Odynsky contended the Ukrainian guards were there to protect the camp from Polish Communist partisans (guerrillas) who might have attacked to obtain armaments stored there. He acknowledged, however, no such attack ever took place.

He also contended that Polish partisans were sympathetic to the Ukrainian guards because "they knew we were there by force...and we had to follow orders given by the Germans."

Earlier, the court travelled to Ukraine to hear nine witnesses, all but one called by the defence. The witnesses included four ex-Trawniki guards.

The case resumes on April 19 and Odynsky is expected to testify shortly afterwards.

Seven other war crimes cases are either still before the courts or have concluded with a decision pending.

A decision is expected in the Helmut Oberlander case, which wrapped up in Kitchener, Ont., as well as in the Podins case in Vancouver. Final argument is being heard in the Serge Kisluk case.

Meanwhile, last week defence lawyers asked the Federal Court of Appeal to review Justice Marc Nadon's decision rejecting their application for a stay of proceedings in the Vladimir Katriuk case in Montreal.

In Windsor, the Michael Baumgartner case will resume at the end of April, while the Ludwig Nebel case continues before the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) in Niagara Falls.

The IRB in Toronto will also hear a refugee claim by Wasily Bogutin, who has been ordered deported from Canada.

Torah's view of racism explained

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Racism is forbidden in Judaism, not just because it hurts the victim, but because it poisons the character of the perpetrator, says educator Rachael Turkienicz.

Turkienicz, who is also a columnist for The Canadian Jewish News, was the keynote speaker at this year's Leo Baeck Day School annual Learn-In, where the theme was racism and race relations. Speakers included Danny Fine, Ontario Community Relations UJA Federation; Elyse Graff, national executive director, Council of Christians and Jews; Constable Ricky Vecrappan, York Regional Police; Tracy Richardson, Regal Road School in Mississauga, who spoke about the black experience; and Jeff Shneer, Canadian Native Centre.

"You are not allowed to treat people badly. You are not allowed to call people names because their skin color or their hair or their eyes are different," Turkienicz said.

In the Bible, she said, Moses states categorically that one may not oppress the vulnerable. The Talmud explains this as forbidding one to deny employment, to pay a lower salary, or to deny someone a place to live.

"You are not even allowed to oppress someone verbally [by insulting or denigrating them]" she added.

Even if you are not caught acting badly, "you know what you have done."

The Torah demands that if you are going to take eggs from a nest, you must first chase the mother bird away. "Can the bird be hurt [by having the eggs taken away]? Will the bird even understand what happened?"

The injunction has to do with you, not with the bird, she said. "You must recognize and respect the relationship between the bird and the eggs. If not, you will become a cruel person."

Furthermore, the Bible says that you shall not wrong a stranger, because you were once a stranger in Egypt. "You are no different from anyone else. Everyone has been up and everyone has been down."

God created everyone from Adam and Eve so that people would realize that we all come from the same place. "You can't say you are different from someone else, because you aren't. Racism, then, is illogical, because we would have to hate ourselves."

This idea is not just for seemingly serious offences but relates to everyday life.

"You can't oppress or victimize anyone," she said.

It is wrong to ostracize a kid at school, or to have a party and invite everyone except one or two classmates. "You have made them a stranger and are oppressing them. You can't alienate one group of kids for any reason."

The book of Kohellet (Ecclesiastes) says you can be a great scholar and a pious person, but "you are a hypocrite if you see the tears of the victim and give them no comfort," Turkienicz said.

But the Torah goes further. Not only are you not allowed to discriminate against someone, "you are not allowed to create a minority and then treat them differently."

Rabbi Wein urges tolerance to counter fragmentation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews today have no business being triumphant about the fact that we are still around, asserts noted author, speaker, and historian Rabbi Berel Wein.

"In fact," he told Mizrachi Organization of Toronto's First Outstanding Personality Lecture, "We have barely survived – we are hanging on by our fingernails."

The Jewish world in this century has been "rocked by events no one could have imagined in their worst nightmares. There is [no Jewish community of] Poland, Lithuania, Hungary, Russia, Germany. They are all gone."

Representatives of normative, mainstream Judaism were destroyed, he said, citing Lithuania, where 99 per cent of the Jewish population died.

"The Jewish world is shaped to a large extent by those who survived – the marginal on both left and right, those formerly on the edges of Jewish life. They built the post war world in their image."

That, Rabbi Wein said, is why Jews are so fragmented. "The cohesive middle is not there. A whole generation that could have bound us together is not there. Extremists [both religious and secular] drive our agendas."

An example is the demonstrations on Bar-Ilan Street in Jerusalem for and against closing the street on Shabbat.

"The secular bused in kibbutzniks, the residents brought in their supporters to throw stones. When one side couldn't make it, they cancelled the demonstrations."

He charged that "we are solving problems by demonstrations, not by dialogue."

Rabbi Berel Wein

Many schools, he said, ignore the Holocaust completely, "because there are so many questions of faith and history. Others exploit it."

The truth, he said, is that no one really knows how to commemorate it.

He warned that in Jewish history, anything that is not commemorated by ritual and Halachah disappears, and he is concerned that "the same thing will happen to the Holocaust, no matter how many museums and films there are."

Israel, Rabbi Wein said, is a state built "against all enemies. Its gross national product is greater than that of all Arab countries together, if you factor out the oil. We had no experience with statecraft, an army, or the accoutrements of a state. Yet, we learned how to run one. It's not perfect, but it runs."

"Our forefathers would have walked barefoot across Europe in the snow to get to Israel," he continued, but "nobody knows what to do with it, how to react to it."

Some people, even some who live in Israel, reject it, he said.

Rabbi Wein deplored the amount of assimilation in North America. He said statistically and by natural processes there should should be about 15 million American Jews, but there are, in fact, only 5 million.

"That's a loss of 10 million – more than were lost in the Holocaust."

The only way to counteract this situation is by education and tolerance, he said.

"Those who know something have the obligation to those who know nothing. And those who know nothing should not be shouted at, drowned out, or disparaged."

The great ethicist Rabbi Yisroel Salanter said that the way to counteract the Reform movement is "not by excommunicating them, but "by opening our study halls to them."

It is not up to the Orthodox to save Judaism, he said. "It is up to each and every Jew to determine what things will be like for them and for their children."

Holocaust education stressed

Jews who want to be Jewish, whatever stream they are, "should be helped. We must not be exclusionary."

At the beginning of the program, which was held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, the Nachman Sokol award was presented to Ulpanat Orot student Shira Shiderman, and the Max Zeifman award to Hyim Bessin and Aviyoel Sokol, both of Or Chaim.

Rikudiyah dance festival dazzles with Purim performance

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Rikudiyah '99, the annual children's Israeli folk dance festival, was a dazzling display of costumed dancers in a rainbow of colors, among them, queens, kings, jesters, ballet dancers, mad hatters and clowns, in all shapes and sizes.

This year was the first time in its 29-year history that the dance festival was close enough to Purim that the holiday could be the festival's theme, said director Teme Kernerman. "There was lots of fun and merry making in keeping with the Purim spirit."

Some 300 children participated from 16 schools, which included Associated Hebrew School's two campuses; United Synagogue Day School's (USDS) three campuses; Bialik Hebrew Day School; B'nai Shalom Hebrew School; the Downtown Jewish Community School; Leo Baeck Day School; She'arim Hebrew Day School; Toronto Heschel School; and the religious schools of Bet Sefer Solel, Holy Blossom, Temple Emanu-el, Temple Kol Ami, and Temple Sinai.

Rikudiyah '99 was co-sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) of UJA Federation.

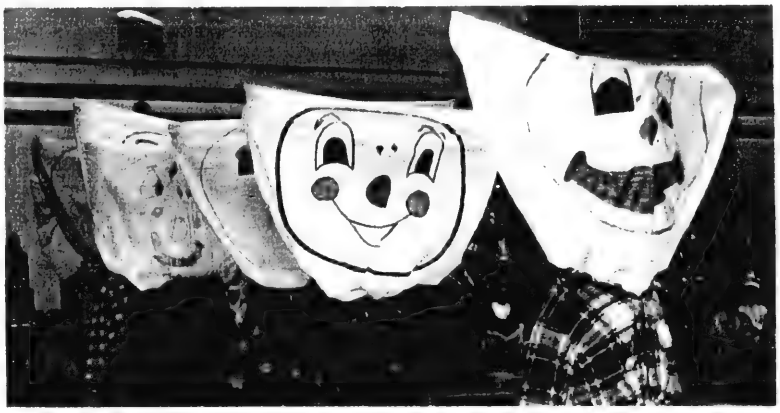
Kernerman noted that 900 spectators filled the bleachers of the York University gymnasium, bringing the total number of people in attendance to 1,250.

The festival also included a guest performance by the Jerusalem Dancers, who danced to Israeli music set to a South American beat; soloist Eyal Antebby also performed.

There was even a gorilla on hand. Reuben Schiff, Bialik school dance instructor, had dressed up to add to the Purim spirit, Kernerman said. "He must have plutzed in that outfit."

The group from USDS Bayview campus opened the show with Bimdinat Hagamadim (In the land of the little people). The performers wore pillow cases with big faces drawn on them, and wrapped shirts around their waists to give the impression that they had huge heads and tiny bodies. Entering the gym to a drum beat, they wound their way through the groups of students on the gym floor.

As in every Rikudiyah, the children learn a new dance. Demonstrators were sent to each group to help teach the dance, Lehtzanim K'tanim (little clowns), Kernerman said. "The nice thing this year [was that] we included the audience. They did the dance in the bleachers."



Students at the Bayview campus of USDS make their entrance at Rikudiyah '99.

The children participating in the Rikudiyah, which is open to students in grades 3 to 5, all perform the same dances. In November, Kernerman introduces the dances to be performed to the instructors at the various school, who teach it to the students.

Kernerman calls the Rikudiyah "performance without the pressure," because the teachers are on the gym floor dancing with the kids.

Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, ex-executive director of the BJE said, "It was wonderful to have the opportunity to bring the children from across the educational spectrum of our community together for fun and celebration. The community should seek to do more of such activities."

Joyce Levine, director of interschool activities for the BJE, said the event was "exciting and ran smoothly" and she was quick to credit Kernerman with the success of the event. "Teme does an excellent job."

Kernerman said that the day after Rikudiyah '99 she was already thinking about the next festival. "In the year 2000, Rikudiyah will celebrate three decades."

"It's a wonderful program. It's a lot of work, but it's a labor of love for me. It's a way of passing on our culture and heritage to the children.

"People came up to me and said they had participated or performed [as students] and now they are bringing their own children. That's what it's all about."

Art festival attracts new students to campus group

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On opening night at last week's Jewish student art festival, Colouring Ourselves, Zac Kaye cheerfully said he was unable to help a reporter locate one of the artists.

The fact the director of Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto didn't even know the artist satisfied him that the three-day event had succeeded in reaching out to students who might not otherwise affiliate with a Jewish group.

University of Toronto student Davina Nathan, left, shows one of her richly detailed paintings. At right, Dorot editor Carolynn McLean Schwartz, a York University student, is seen with her grandmother Yetta Schwartz, who inspired Carolynn's first Dorot contribution. [Frances Kraft photos]

"There's a whole group of students [here that] we don't know," he said happily..

Ontario College of Art student Miriam Herlin said that a lot of her Jewish-themed art is helping her learn and connecting her to her Judaism for the first time. She has been studying Judaism and is working on a Judaic series. Her 613 Mitzvoth is an impressionistic oil on canvas. She also has three works on display at Centro.

The first JCS arts festival took place last year. A Zukerman Family Foundation grant facilitated the hiring of Tamar Kagan as JCS arts and culture coordinator, and festival director for this year.

At one time, Hillel was "a Jewish club on campus. Today it belongs to everybody," Kaye told the crowd in the Poor Alex Theatre, which had been cleared of seating to facilitate viewing of the work.

"This program reflects our diversity," he said.

The festival theme was "What's on your mind?" Some of the answers found in the visual arts entries were sex, innocence, fathers and sons, Israelis and Arabs, and Jewish lesbian readings of traditional western fairy tales.

Chana Boxer, a student at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, submitted Shayne Maidle, a hand-made paper blouse embroidered in red metallic thread. She had been exploring identity, memory and costume.

York University student Elana Sadinsky reproduced a 700-year-old Hebrew manuscript using tempera, gold leaf and gold leafing paint on parchment paper.

And Ryerson media arts student Michelle Astrug had an unusual self-portrait, woven from two color photocopies of a childhood picture.

There were also sculptures, and a number of photographic entries depicting aspects of Israel.

Opening ceremonies included performance art by Mitch Smolkin, a University of Toronto theatre student; and readings from the newest issue of Jewish student literary publication Dorot, by Shira Honig, Barbi Price and editor in chief Carolynn McLean Schwartz.

The trio Beyond the Pale played "gypsy klezgrass fusion" music as over 100 people viewed the exhibition of about 30 pieces. The festival also featured, on each night respectively, a screening of films, music and theatre. Organizers estimate a total of 400 people attended.

"You can sense the energy is that everyone is hungry for this kind of thing," said festival volunteer Yoni Stanleigh, a University of Toronto student.

"It's a great venue to display Jewish talent," said Roy Yonash, whose girlfriend, Chana Boxer, was one of the artists. "There probably aren't enough venues like this around the city."

Rabbi joins lawsuit on genetically-altered foods

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Allan Green, spiritual leader of Winnipeg's Conservative Beth Israel Synagogue, is party to a lawsuit that has to do with genetic manipulation of food.

The lawsuit was launched last spring in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. against the American Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

The object of the legal action is to force the FDA to perform extensive safety testing, and to mandate labeling of all genetically altered food products so that people with allergies can avoid products that may be dangerous to their health.

"A gene from a Brazil nut was added to a strain of soybeans," Rabbi Green explains as an example. "It was found that people with allergies to nuts had an allergic reaction to the soybeans with the Brazil nut gene. Under existing regulations, the addition of that gene would not appear on the package label among a list of ingredients."

Rabbi Green became involved in the legal case through a longtime friend, Steven Drucker, a lawyer, lecturer and author of books on ethics and psychology, who launched the suit.

Drucker, an observant Jew who lives in Iowa, has also signed a Conservative rabbi from Georgetown University, a Lubavitcher Rabbi from Brooklyn and the congregation he belongs to in Fairfield, Iowa, on to the suit.

"I am glad to be part of this," Rabbi Green says. "I believe in the merits of the case. I allowed Steven [Drucker] to file a statement on my behalf to be used as evidence which I was able to edit and add to. I have spoken out about this issue whenever I have had a chance to."

Rabbi Green points out that because the work is being done at the level of DNA, scientists and religious leaders assume that nothing has really been done. "DNA molecules have evolved over billions of years. They are the root of life itself. We alter them at our peril."

One problem with DNA is that it is dynamic, he says. Once a genetically altered species of plant or animal is released in the world, the DNA pool is altered forever. Thus, for example, if crops are developed that are highly resistant to herbicides and a weed picks up that DNA, the weed could become very tough to kill.

There are serious implications for kashrut in this matter as well, he says.

Although genetic engineering is done at the micro level and kashrut is determined at the macro level, the results of the genetic manipulation could well be macroscopic, Rabbi Green says.

"Genetic engineering may be violating species barriers that have existed since time immemorial," he says. "We are not talking about cross-pollination or hybridization – which are still functioning within the basic laws of biology. Genetic engineering allows scientists to cross species together that were never intended by nature to be crossed."

Orthodox Rabbi Ya'acov Benamou of Winnipeg's Herzlia Synagogue does not see a problem where kashrut is concerned, but he does agree that man has no business changing nature.

"To change nature can cause damage for generations to come," he says.

"We should leave this sort of thing alone unless we have clear evidence that no harm will come of it."

Community kiddush a success

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

LONDON, ONT. — The London Jewish Community Centre (JCC) was recently the site of a first-ever community kiddush, bringing together worshippers from Congregation Beth Tefilah, Congregation Or Shalom and Congregation Temple Israel – London's Orthodox, Conservative and Reform synagogues respectively.

The event was the brainchild of Arye Berk, director of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Western Ontario and community programmer for the London Jewish Federation, which serves a population of about 3,000.

Over 200 people attended the kiddush. They came "from every different branch of Judaism, including the branch that does not attend shul," Berk said.

Berk, a member of Or Shalom, believes "too much time is spent talking about our differences and not enough time is spent building on the everyday dealings that unite us as Jews."

Rabbi Mitchell Cohen of Beth Tefilah said in a phone interview that he, Rabbi Larry Lander of Or Shalom, and Rabbi Joel Wittstein of Temple Israel "work extremely well together" and have become very friendly.

Rabbis Cohen, Lander and Wittstein meet regularly regarding community issues such as kashrut (Rabbi Cohen supervises the London Vaad Hakashrut)

"We do not get into issues regarding Jewish law [but rather] how we can make the Jewish community of London stronger," said Rabbi Cohen.

His Reform colleague, Rabbi Wittstein, said there is "a real sense of collegiality" among the three rabbis. "We get along well and we get along easily." Working together allows them to keep a finger on the pulse of the community and offer support where needed, he added.

"We can't always have the same service together, but it's nice to get together for the parts we can get together for," said Rabbi Lander. "Obviously, if the three rabbis are in agreement and have the goodwill, then things like a community kiddush can happen."

And it did, over herring, cookies and cake.

Berk hopes to run a second community kiddush in June. "Everybody said we should do it again."

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The questions may have been clumsy and insensitive, but it should come as no surprise that pollsters focus on ethnic nuances when profiling a political riding. This is especially true when the riding is newly created, as is the case in the Ontario provincial riding of Thornhill.

The initial spin the story received, and the one which prompted a public response by the Ontario branch of Canadian Jewish Congress, sees such polling as unreasonably targeting an ethnic community.

The flip side is that it suggests the latent potency of any minority that is even moderately well-organized.

Every political riding, be it federal, provincial or municipal, has a particular character. Parties routinely attempt to field candidates who will resonate well in that riding – even if this occasionally creates friction in the party's internal nomination process.

Based on the numbers, there are almost two dozen federal ridings across the country in which the Jewish population is statistically significant. To a pollster, this kind of insight is pure gold and the potential it represents is "way puissant."

In this context, the recent tempest in Thornhill takes on an entirely different meaning. Despite having already gone through a process that resulted in the nomination of Tina Molinari, the provincial Tories had second thoughts. Did the Liberals have an intrinsic advantage heading into the provincial election simply because their candidate was a Jew and a child of a Holocaust survivor? In an election that all pundits expect to be extremely close, every riding counts.

So what was characterized as insulting may well have been nothing more than the grittier side of politics. It is curious that the principals involved in the incident all chose to publicly ignore this side of the coin.

Whatever the reasons, for the Jewish community the implications should be very clear. As the saying goes: "Use it or lose it."

There is an impression that Jews have become complacent about their place in the political arena. There are ridings across Canada in which Jewish candidates would be most attractive for any political party. There are ridings whose composition provide the organized community with significant leverage on policy issues – if it is used judiciously and responsibly.

Harnessing that capacity requires a degree of organization and unity. That's a fairly precious dividend on its own. Once the loss of influence and access to the political world is factored into the equation it would almost be irresponsible not to become more visibly engaged in the process.

Consumers enjoy taste treat at Kosher Fare

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — When is a vegetable unkosher?

According to Rabbi Ely Braun, there is no such thing as an unkosher vegetable – yet. With the rapid advances being made in genetic engineering, however, there may be a different answer in the future.

This was one of the many questions that arose during a panel discussion by Rabbi Braun, Rabbi Arnold Fine and Rabbi Howard Finkelstein, as part of the day-long Kosher Fare 1999 held recently.

Rabbi Zischa Shaps, founder of Jewish Education through Torah (JET), which co-sponsored the event with the Soloway Jewish Community Centre in cooperation with the Ottawa Vaad HaKashruth, said, "our goal is that people will find that it is not as difficult to keep kosher as they think, and that more people will buy kosher products and keep a kosher home."

To that end, kosher caterers, hotels and retail establishments set up displays and booths to showcase their wares.

People wandered around, enjoyed samples of the various products and took part in educational workshops such as kashering for Pesach.

One of the highlights was a kosher wine tasting presented by a representative of the LCBO.

Irwin Schweitzer, who chaired the organizing committee, and is an accomplished cook, was pleased with the vast array of kosher products. "Hunting for kosher products on the shelves in my local grocery stores will be all the more enjoyable now that I have seen all the products available," he said.

Not all the displays were edible. Cathy Levine and Brian Levitan represented Melaleuca of Canada which handles a line of household cleaning products that carry the Star-K symbol. "We came because we wanted an opportunity to let the kosher consumers know that these products, which are also non-toxic and environmentally friendly, are available here. More and more people are sensitive to additives and to the environment, and these products are totally natural, says Levine."

Throughout the day, children had a variety of programs and kosher treats such as cotton candy.

Elwy Yost's producer a consummate movie buff

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Call her the woman behind the man.

Elwy Yost is the genial host and face of TVOntario's Saturday Night at the Movies, which marks its 25th anniversary this month. Risa Shuman, the series producer, toils in anonymity, but relishes every minute of it. "It's been the most perfect job," she says.

Shuman, who arrived at TVOntario in 1973 fresh from York University's first graduating class in film, is a consummate movie buff.

Practically weaned on double features in Hamilton's now-extinct Capitol Theatre, she seems to live for movies.

"My extracurricular activities have always involved films," explains Shuman, a member of the Jewish Film Society's board. "On holidays, I go to film festivals. At home, I rent films."

Shuman, who grew up reading her father's copy of Variety, the bible of the entertainment industry, is a walking encyclopedia.

Yost hired her as a researcher because she was the only person to have noticed that King Kong, the Hollywood classic he had just aired, was missing a sequence. "Risa," gushes Yost, "knows movies like no one else." She returns the compliment. "He's like my second dad."

Although they have worked together since 1974, Shuman caught her first glimpse of Yost in 1966, when she was a Grade 11 student. "I used to race home from school to catch a TV series called Passport to Adventure, which he hosted and featured movies with an adventurous feel to them."

In 1981, she was named associate producer. Five years later, she was appointed co-producer. By then, she was also producing Film International, which specializes in foreign films. When Yost retired from his permanent position at TVOntario in 1987, she replaced him as series producer.

Shuman, who has been a juror at Canadian, Spanish and Scottish film festivals, believes that Saturday Night at the Movies' greatest achievement has been "to bring films from the late, late show" ghetto into a mainstream setting. "For years," she observes, "no one cared about these films, and now they're very desirable."

Saturday Night at the Movies also spawned a host of imitators, from the American Movie Channel to The Movie Network.

Shuman, single at 47, chooses the films and the guests, and administers the budget. She works with a writer, a researcher and a director. Accompanied by Yost and writer Michael Leo, she spends a week in Los Angeles once a year filming interviews.

On average, the show attracts 250,000 viewers per week, which she considers "pretty remarkable." Its highest-rated films have been Alfred Hitchcock's North by Northwest, followed closely by Vertigo, Jaws and The Bridge on the River Kwai. They each posted an audience exceeding 500,000 and, she boasts, bested Hockey Night in Canada in the Ontario market.

Risa Shuman

Specializing in American and British classics, Saturday Night at the Movies has run its share of Jewish-interest films, from The Pawnbroker and Gentleman's Agreement to The Diary of Anne Frank and The House of Rothschild.

On Film International, Shuman has showcased Israeli films like Gila Almagor's The Summer of Aviya and Under the Domim Tree.

It may come as a surprise that Shuman does not have access to some films. Complicated copyright issues and financial considerations are only part of the problem. Another factor is that specialty movie channels have drained existing stocks. "For instance, we used to be able to buy a lot of MGM films, but no more."

Shuman's favorite film is The Wizard of Oz, which she calls "the most perfect film ever made." She has seen it at least 30 times.

She also thinks highly of On the Waterfront, Annie Hall, Hester Street, Crossing Delancey and American Graffiti, among others.

She credits her father Milt for having introduced her to movies.

"He used to let me stay up late at night and watch movies on TV," she recalls. And on weekends, to give his paralyzed wife Miriam a break, he would deposit Shuman and her sister Linda, in a theatre and pick them up hours later. The chaperone would usually be their grandmother.

These nostalgic memories still glow in Shuman's heart and, perhaps subliminally, exert a tremendous influence in shaping the tone of Saturday Night at the Movies.

Novelist creates Chagall-like landscape of shtetl life

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Asked how she's handling her new-found fame, Lilian Nattel quaintly blushes. "Fame is very relative," she manages. "I don't feel famous. I still take the subway, which drives my agent crazy.

"Actually, it's very nerve-wracking. I'm afraid it's all a dream, and that I'll wake up."

It's no dream, although Nattel's first novel, already a runaway hit with critics and readers, has been called dream-like. The River Midnight (Knopf, 414 pages, $32), an astonishing accomplishment for a first-time novelist, is Nattel's loving paean to her pre-Holocaust, Polish shtetl roots.

The book has been greeted with gushing reviews across North America and Britain, topped off by a rich endorsement from Time magazine. It reached number 4 on MacLean's bestseller list and is making the climb into the top 10 on the prestigious Independent Bookseller's list. It's also been a Book-of-the-Month Club alternate selection.

Fresh from a series of whirlwind media interviews, the 42-year-old ex-Montrealer and former accountant, sits in her modest kitchen in Toronto's Annex, wraps her small hands around a cup of hot tea, and reflects on a book that for all its success, was almost not written.

"I was really resistant to writing this," Nattel says. "I didn't want to be 'a Jewish writer.'" What was she afraid of? "I'm not sure I have a rational answer. I guess I was afraid of preconceptions, of being stereotyped.

"Another aspect had to do with finding my voice as someone who grew up after the Holocaust. I had a great uncertainty as to how to express myself as a Jewish woman after the Holocaust. It really was a matter of not being ready."

Ready or not, Nattel has produced a lushly textured portrayal of the vibrant, seething, chaotic, noisy, Yiddish 19th-century world of Blaszka, a fictional shtetl northwest of Warsaw, where prayer, sex, food, music and ritual collide in a cacophony of life that is no more.

Nattel's skilful recreation of a vanished world takes the reader into the lives of dozens of Jewish families working, praying, gossiping and even enjoying marital infidelities. Blaszka is populated with unforgettable characters, most importantly, four women who grew up as vilda hayahs (wild children) and took different paths to womanhood.

There's the barren Hanna-Leah, who runs her husband's butcher shop and loves to dream and dip into the Polnocna (Midnight) River; Faygele's eldest child is in jail for spreading "radical" political ideas; Zisa-Sara dies in the strange new world of America, and her orphaned children are returned to the village to be raised by friends.

Straddling it all like a colossus is earthy, iron-willed Misha, the midwife who divorces her husband and heretically refuses to reveal the father of her child, born on the eve of Yom Kippur.

Dotting the Chagall-like landscape are Russians, rabbis, gentiles, pedlars, poets, shlemiels and shlemazels. Each of the nine chapters is told from a different point of view, complete with Yiddish flourishes, and the author doesn't skimp on rich detail used to describe food preparation, religious ritual, family routine and even sexual attitudes.

The result is a celebration of a lost way of life, one that valued scholarship, charity and toughness. Despite the threat of pogroms, despite the poverty and mud and disease, the denizens of Blaszka maintain a dignity and strong sense of community.

Even hard-bitten critics haven't been able to resist comparisons of The River Midnight to Shalom Aleichem and Isaac Bashevis Singer.

Lillian Nattel

"Now," Nattel smiles triumphantly, " I feel very differently about things. I see my being Jewish as something that nourishes me. And it can nourish me in anything I choose to write."

It almost sounds as though the author pines for the shtetl of her own Polish grandparents.

"Oh no!" she protests. "There was terrible poverty and disease. Women were oppressed. The book is set between pogroms. It was no fun. It's much better to be Canadian."

Nattel confesses that had she known, prior to sitting down to a keyboard, how much research was required for the book, she may have passed.

"I thought it would take a year. I ended up reading over 100 books," including memoirs, fictional essays, letters, memorial books, the lyrics to folksongs and even prayers written for women. Everything is historically accurate, but from my point of view."

Nattel loves "her" women.

Based loosely on stories she heard of her mother's friends, the women of Blaszka are the glue that holds the village together. Misha is a mythic figure, larger than life, Nattel says, who represents some kind of powerful life-force. As for the sex, both the pre- and extra-marital variety, Nattel doesn't shy

Food Ideas for Passover

Cookbook celebrates good times

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Elise Mecklinger, a librarian by profession, is a wife and mother of three sons, 19, 17 and 11. She is also a successful cookbook author.

Her first book, Friendly Fare, raised funds for the Doctors' Hospital, now part of The Toronto Hospital. Celebrations (Macmillan, 1998) will benefit the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

"I had all this energy," she said in her homey, yet efficient kitchen, full of family pictures and memorabilia, that was designed for her by husband Alan, a real estate developer. "I put my energy and creativity into cooking – every one appreciated and enjoyed it."

She decided that she wanted to partner her hobby, cooking, with her professional expertise, knowing how to do research projects. Hence, the cookbooks.

Celebrations offers "menus that celebrate good times with family and friends." She suggests foods, centrepieces, preparation schedules, and presentations.

"My goal was to give simple, entertaining menus to prove that you could put on an elegant spread without too much fuss. Events go from breakfast at the cottage, to afternoon tea, to childrens' parties, to family parties.

While some of the recipes are not kosher, many can be adapted.

While her husband doesn't cook, her three sons do. "They watched me cooking and just picked it up," she said.

Mecklinger and her lemon meringue curd.

Mecklinger has a Web site, full of menus, recipes, and health and fitness tips. The address is www.elisemecklinger.com.

She has prepared a seder menu for this supplement. You will find the recipes original, appealing and best of all, not complicated.

PEAR AND MANGO CHAROSET

2 medium-sized pears, cored and coarsely chopped
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 cup fresh mango, peeled and diced
½ cup raisins
¼ cup walnuts
½ tsp. cinnamon
1 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. sweet Passover wine

Place pears in a mixing bowl and sprinkle with lemon juice.

Place all ingredients, except for the wine, in the work bowl of a food processor.

Pulse once or twice.

Transfer mixture to a mixing bowl. Stir in wine. Cover and refrigerate at least one hour before serving.

This recipe yields about 2-3 cups, or 12 servings.

PASSOVER MINESTRONE SOUP WITH MINI MATZOH BALLS

¼ cup vegetable oil
2 tbsp. minced fresh garlic
1 small onion, cut in ¼-inch cubes
1 leek (white part and 1 inch green), quartered lengthwise and cut into thin slices

2 small zucchinis cut in ½-inch cubes
1 small sweet potato cut in ½-inch cubes
7 cups chicken stock
28 oz. can tomatoes
½ cup chopped fresh parsley
¼ cup chopped fresh basil
salt and pepper to taste

In a large saucepan, heat oil over medium heat. Saute garlic, onion, leek, carrots, zucchini, and sweet potato over medium heat for 5 minutes. Add broth and tomatoes. Bring to a boil.

Reduce heat to medium low. Add parsley and basil.

Cover and simmer for 1½ hours. Sprinkle with salt and pepper.

Mini Matzoh Balls

2 tbsp. pareve margarine
1 bunch green onions, thinly sliced, green parts removed
4 large eggs
2 tbsp. vegetable oil

Food Ideas for Passover

Cookbook celebrates good times with family, friends

In a large mixing bowl, whisk together eggs, oil, salt and pepper with a wire whisk. Stir in matzah meal mixture. Cover and refrigerate until firm, about 2 hours.

Line a large cookie sheet with a sheet of wax paper. Dip hands into cold water and roll rounded teaspoons of matzah mixture into balls. Place on sheet, chill 30 minutes.

In a large saucepan, bring water/stock to a boil. Slip the matzah balls into the broth/water. Reduce heat to simmer. Cover and cook about 35 minutes. Remove with a slotted spoon.

This recipe yields 8-12 servings.

OVEN BARBEQUED BRISKET

Barbeque Sauce

1 cup ketchup
3 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ cup apple juice
¼ cup Passover brown sugar
2 tbsp. honey
2 tsp. minced fresh garlic
1 tbsp. oil
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

In a medium saucepan, heat all ingredients over low heat. Stir with a wire whisk until thoroughly blended, about 7-10 minutes.

1 4-5 lb. single brisket
Salt, pepper, paprika
2 large onions, cut in chunks
2 large carrots, peeled, cut in 1-inch chunks
1 head garlic, cloves peeled and separated

Preheat oven to 350 degrees. Sprinkle brisket with salt, pepper, and paprika.

Place onions, carrots and garlic cloves in the bottom of a roasting pan. Place brisket over top. Pour sauce over brisket. Cover and roast for 3½-4 hours. If sauce appears to be evaporating, add a little water to the pan. Remove lid and cook another 30 minutes or until the brisket is fork tender.

It is a good idea to make a brisket the day before. Slice it cold and spoon sauce over top. Reheat covered in 350 degree oven for 30-45 minutes until hot.

SPINACH CUPCAKES

1 tbsp. oil
½ cup onion cut in ½-inch cubes
1 cup mushrooms, thinly sliced
1 cup carrots, peeled, cut in ¼-inch rounds
2-3 cups cooked spinach
2 tsp. minced fresh garlic
4 eggs, lightly beaten
½ cup matzah meal
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

Preheat oven to 350 degrees.

In a large skillet heat oil over medium heat. Saute onion, mushrooms, and carrots for 3-5 minutes. Add spinach and garlic and saute another 2-3 minutes.

Place eggs in a large mixing bowl. Add veggie mixture and thoroughly mix together with a wooden spoon. Add matzah meal and stir until well blended.

Pour mixture into greased muffin tins (about 12-16). Bake for 45 minutes.

Use 8 egg whites instead of the 4 eggs to lower the cholesterol consumption.

BROCCOLI STUFFED KNISHES

1 tsp. oil
1 onion, cut in ½-cubes
½ tsp. minced fresh garlic
2 cups mashed potatoes, or 1 cup mashed potatoes and 1 cup mashed sweet potato
2 tbsp. potato starch
½ cup matzah meal
2 eggs, or 4 egg whites
¾ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
2 cups cooked broccoli, finely chopped
1 egg beaten

Innovative recipes help cure Passover's matzah blues

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It's easy to get tired of matzah on Pesach. Sure, it's a mitzvah to eat it; it reminds us of our ancestors and the miracle that brought us out of Egypt, and it brings back memories of our past.

But it's still matzah.

That being said, Matza 101, by Jenny Kdoshim and Debbie Bevans (1997) offers a wide selection of recipes that highlight, well, matzah. There are Mexican and Italian recipes: dairy, pareve and fleischig; elaborate and plain.

Many of the recipes call for prepared matzah, for which you must soak the matzah until it is soft. With the soaked matzah, you can make dishes you wouldn't think possible on Pesach, such as Matzah Maple Pecan or Peach Raspberry Tarts, Salsa Cream Cheese Mousse and Veggie Calzones.

There are lush color plates, as well as black and white instructional photos. An excellent Pesach book, if at times a tad convoluted.

MATZAH CHEESE LASAGNA

2 tbsp. oil or Passover spray
2 medium onions, finely chopped
1 celery stalk, finely chopped
6 garlic cloves, pressed
4 cups peeled tomatoes (fresh or canned)
4 cups Passover tomato sauce
½ cup Passover tomato paste
1 cup water
2 tbsp. lemon juice, fresh
1 tbsp. EACH basil and oregano, fresh or dried
salt and pepper to taste.

Preheat oven to 350. Heat oil over medium heat for about 30 seconds. Add onion and celery. Saute until limp and the onion is light brown. Add garlic, saute for about 30 seconds. Lower heat; add the remaining ingredients and let the sauce cook uncovered for about 15 minutes, stirring occasionally. Remove from heat and leave sauce uncovered. While the sauce cooks, prepare filling.

6 sheets matzah
2 cups cottage cheese
2 cups ricotta cheese
1½ cups grated mozzarella cheese
1 cup grated parmesan cheese
1 egg, beaten
⅛ tsp. nutmeg (if available for Passover)
1 tsp. black pepper
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley

Reserve ½ cup of the mozzarella cheese and ½ cup of the parmesan. Mix all the rest in a bowl, except matzah. Grease a 9x13x2 deep dish pan and place some of the tomato mixture in the bottom. Place two pieces of matzah over the sauce, side by side, and top with ⅓ cup cheese mixture, and top that with 1 cup sauce. Repeat the layering, ending with tomato sauce. Top with reserved mozzarella and parmesan cheeses. Place in oven for about 45 minutes. Let cool for about 15 minutes, and serve with extra sauce on the side. Serves 8.

MATZAH FRUIT PANCAKES

2 cups matzah scraps
1 cup milk
4 eggs, beaten
2 cups fruit, diced (apples, pears, peaches, etc.)
2 tbsp. sugar
4 tbsp. margarine
1½ cups sour cream
¼cup powdered sugar, if available for Passover

In a large bowl, break matzah into small pieces and combine with milk until liquid has been absorbed.

Add eggs, fruit, sugar, and mix well.

Kashruth Council issues guidelines on kosher products

The following is a guide to over-the-counter drugs and household products that may be used for Passover 1999/5759

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council of Toronto has circulated a request to drug firms and other related manufacturers asking them to provide a list of ingredients in their products.

All products ingested during Passover should have a "Kosher for Passover" endorsement. If "Kosher for Passover" products are not available and there is a medical need for any of the products, the items should be used in separate utensils.

We have not supervised the production of these products, but from the information received, there appears to be no chometz in these listed products.

GENERAL GUIDELINES:

(a) Brown sugar and icing sugar should be used only with Passover supervision.

(b) Cosmetics, toiletries, soap, topical medications, which are in solid form or are thick creams, ointments and salves, may be used (preferably without perfume). Please consult your rabbi about wheat and oat based soaps.

(c) The following items, which are not fit for human consumption (preferably unscented, when applicable) are permissible on Passover (excluding Sabbath and Yom Tov). Nail polish, hand lotion, hand cream, cold cream, unscented baby lotion, baby cream, shampoo (without wheat), shoe polish, ink, paint, solid air freshener, nail polish remover, stick deodorants, eye shadow, eyeliner, mascara, blush and rouge, non-flavored new lipsticks.

(d) The following may contain chometz: Pet and fish food (i.e. hydrolysed vegetable protein, starch, etc.), baby powder. The following are chometz: Play Dough and Postum.

(e) Balloons and rubber gloves may have starches inside.

(f) Plastic bags and wraps do not need kosher supervision when used for cold food.

Generally, when taking medication during Passover, preference should be given to non-chewable tablets rather than liquids and chewable tablets. Many products contain ingredients that are only permitted to be used on Passover for medical reasons. A competent rav who is familiar with the information upon which this flyer is based must be consulted prior to the use of these products. If there is any item that you must take during Passover and it is not found with reliable Passover supervision, please contact your rav who may have additional information.

PRODUCTS:

Milk Enzyme: Lactaid tablets, caplets and drops should not be used on Passover. In case of great need, lactose-free milk should be purchased before Passover. Use separate utensils.

Infant Formula (Kitnyos): All infant formulas listed below should be used in separate utensils. Formula is available in liquid and powder. Check each container for a hechsher, since not all forms are kosher endorsed. Enfalac; Isomil; Prosobee; Similac, Enfamil.

Nutritional Supplements (Kitnyos): These products are not produced under Passover supervision. They should be used only when there is no alternative in consultation with a rabbi. Boost; Ensure; Isocal; Sustacal.

Oral Care: Kosher for Passover toothpaste is recommended. Johnson & Johnson dental floss (unwaxed and unflavored) Polident.

The following oral care products are kitnyos:

Toothpaste: Crest regular; Crest coolmint gel; Crest for Kids sparkle gel; Colgate regular; Colgate superstar; Colgate gel.

Matzah mozzarella melts

Over medium heat, place 2 tbsp. margarine in a medium-sized non-stick skillet. Make sure the skillet is heated before starting to cook pancakes.

Place ¼ cup of the fruit/matzah mixture in the hot skillet. Spread the mixture with the back of the spoon to somewhat flatten out pancake to about 3 to 4 inches. This will allow room for about 3 pancakes in your skillet at a time.

Cook about 3 min. on each side or until golden, then transfer onto a serving platter. Garnish with sour cream and powdered sugar.

MATZAH MOZZARELLA MELTS

4 matzah sheets
1½ cups mozzarella cheese, shredded
1 medium onion, sweet and sliced
½ cup canned mushrooms, sliced and drained
1 medium-sized tomato, thinly sliced

Place matzah on aluminum foiled broiler pan that has been lightly sprayed with non-stick vegetable spray. Evenly sprinkle shredded cheese over dry matzah, followed by sliced onions, then mushrooms, and finally sliced tomatoes. Place in broiler for 7 to 10 minutes, or until cheese has melted. 16 servings.

MATZAH CHOCOLATE CLUSTERS

3 cups semi-sweet chocolate pieces
4 cups matzah sheets, hand crumbled
2 cups salted nuts

In a double boiler, melt chocolate pieces over hot water. Bring water to a boil and continue to simmer until all chocolate has melted. (Or melt in the microwave). Once the chocolate has melted, set it aside and let cool at room temperature, about 15-20 minutes. Do not allow the chocolate to get hard. In a greased or buttered mixing bowl, combine melted chocolate, matzah and nuts. Stir this mixture until matzah is well coated with chocolate. Place a piece of waxed paper onto a 13x9 cookie sheet, which should be lightly coated with margarine or butter. Mixture will be sticky.

With wet hands, drop tablespoonful size of mixture onto cookie sheet and refrigerate for about 2 hours. Yields about 30.

Food Ideas for Passover

Calm down cooks, vegetarian seders are no disaster

By EILEEN GOLTZ

We will be having four extra people at our seder this year. The family is new to the community, and my husband and I wanted to make sure they had a place to go where they wouldn't feel too homesick for the family they just couldn't be with. Our seders are awesome (if I do say so myself), but I wanted to know if there was anything special I could serve that would make them feel as if they had some of their own traditions represented.

I called to ask if there were any recipes I could include in our menu. Imagine my surprise when I was told, "Oh, thank you. Our being vegetarians makes a seder quite a challenge."

After stopping to take a breath (and a tranquillizer), I said, "No problem, just get me your recipes and I'll see what I can do."

SPRING VEGETABLE SOUP

2 tbsp. oil
1 large onion, finely chopped
2 medium celery stalks, finely diced
1 medium potato, peeled and finely diced
2 medium carrots, finely diced
6 cups water
2 vegetable bouillon cubes
handful of celery leaves
1 cup drained, canned tomatoes, finely chopped
2 cups finely chopped cauliflower salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
1 cup firmly packed, finely shredded lettuce
1 tbsp. minced fresh dill or more, to taste
2 scallions, minced

Heat the oil in a large soup pot. Add the onion and celery and sauté over moderate heat until golden. Add the potato, carrots, water, bouillon cubes, celery leaves and tomatoes.

Bring to a boil, then lower the heat, cover and simmer for 15 minutes or until the vegetables are nearly tender. Add the cauliflower and continue to simmer for 10 minutes more, or until it is crisp-tender. Season to taste with salt and pepper and remove from the heat.

Let the soup cool, then refrigerate overnight to allow time for it to develop flavor. Just before serving, heat the soup through. Add the remaining ingredients and simmer over very low heat for 10 to 15 minutes. Add more water if the vegetables seem crowded, then adjust the seasonings. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Note: This soup is even better with matzah balls. Vegans can add matzah farfel since matzah balls are made with eggs.

LEEK AND POTATO GRATIN

2 tbsp.Passover margarine
2 large leeks, white parts only, chopped and well rinsed
1 small red bell pepper, finely diced
3 matzahs, broken
1 cup hot water
4 medium potatoes, baked, peeled, and sliced
2/3 cup milk
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 cup grated mozzarella cheese minced chives for topping

Preheat oven to 350. Heat the margarine in a medium-sized skillet. Add the leeks and sauté, covered, until they are wilted. Add the red pepper and sauté another five minutes.

In the meantime, combine the matzahs with the water in a bowl and soak for three to five minutes until soft. Drain and squeeze out excess water with hands. Combine the leek mixture and matzahs with all the remaining ingredients except cheese and chives in a mixing bowl. Stir together until thoroughly mixed. Pour into an oiled, shallow 2-quart casserole. A round dish is particularly attractive. Sprinkle the cheese over the top, followed by the chives. Bake for 35 to 40 minutes, or until the top is golden. Let stand for five to 10 minutes, then cut into squares or wedges to serve. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

MUSHROOM MATZAH FARFEL PIE

1 tsp. Passover seasoned salt
1 cup hot water
1 box (1 lb.) matzah farfel
2 tbsp. Passover margarine
1 cup finely chopped onion
1 lb. mushrooms, chopped
1 medium zucchini
3 egg whites, beaten
seasoned salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Stir the seasoned salt into the water. Combine with the matzah farfel in a heatproof mixing bowl and let soak. In the meantime, heat the margarine in a large skillet. Add the onion and sauté over moderate heat until golden. Add the mushrooms and zucchini and sauté until the mushrooms are wilted.

Drain any excess water from the matzah farfel. Add the mushroom mixture and the beaten egg whites. Season to taste with additional seasoned salt, if desired, and freshly ground pepper. Pour into an oiled 9-inch glass pie plate or 10-inch tart pan. Bake, covered, for 30 minutes. Uncover and bake another 15 minutes or until the top is browned. Let stand for five to 10 minutes, then cut into wedges to serve. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

RUSSIAN POTATO AND MUSHROOM CROQUETTES

1½ lbs. potatoes, peeled and chopped
5 cups water
1 onion, peeled and chopped
¼ lb. mushrooms
1 tsp. oil
1 tbsp. water
salt/pepper to taste
1 cup matzah meal
1 tbsp. oil

Boil potatoes in water until tender. Drain and mash potatoes. In a separate pan, sauté onions and mushrooms in oil and water over medium-high heat for three minutes. In a large bowl, mix mashed potatoes, sautéed onions and mushrooms, seasonings and matzah meal together in a large bowl. Form 10 croquettes. Heat oil in a large frying pan over medium high heat and fry croquettes for eight minutes on each side. Serving size is two croquettes per person.

Food Ideas for Passover

New York Times compiles its best Passover recipes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Names like Wolfgang Puck, Paul Prudhomme and Craig Claiborne don't need a lot of introduction when one sees them in a cookbook. But then, one doesn't really expect to see them in a Pesach cookbook.

Well, there they are in The New York Times Passover Cookbook (Morrow, 1999), along with such Jewish cooking notables as Joan Nathan, Claudia Roden and Mimi Sheraton.

The introduction by Joan Nathan, author of the widely acclaimed Jewish Cooking in America, explains that the book is "a compilation of the best Passover recipes that have appeared in the Times over the years," together with selections from other cookbooks.

While one might expect the recipes to be relentlessly gourmet, in fact, most are the kind that one would realistically prepare. Instructions are clear, and ingredients are easily obtainable.

Today's trend toward fresh herbs, fruits and vegetables is evident, in, for example, fresh tuna cooked with balsamic vinegar, fresh rosemary and a tomato coulis, matzah brei with asparagus, spa slaw of Napa cabbage, green onions and bell pepper with a dressing made with grated orange and lemon rind, and chicken roasted with fresh chives, basil, thyme, chervil and cilantro.

The old favorites are here too – Passover bagels and popovers, gefilte fish, brisket and several different compotes.

The only complaint I have is the reminiscences interspersed through the book. While they are all charming, there is little evidence that Pesach for the authors is anything but a lot of food and children and nostalgia.

Nevertheless, The New York Times Passover Cookbook is a welcome addition to the growing list of Pesach cookbooks.

Food Ideas for Passover

Fruity flavors abound in Passover cookbook

3½ cups dried apricots, soaked in hot water for 1 hr. and drained
3 cups canned plum tomatoes, diced, with juice reserved
2 cups chicken stock or water
⅓ cup Passover brown sugar (or white sugar)

Preheat oven to 350. Heat half the oil in a large saucepan or skillet. Sprinkle the hens with salt and pepper to taste and 1 tsp. of the cinnamon, and brown.

In another large pan, heat the remaining oil, add the onions, and cook over low heat until the onions are transparent, about five minutes.

Add the remaining 3 tsp. cinnamon and the cloves and cook for about three more minutes, stirring occasionally. Remove from heat.

Coarsely chop half of the soaked apricots and set aside. Add about ½ cup of the reserved tomato liquid to the remaining half of the soaked apricots and puree in a food processor or blender. Add the pureed apricots, diced tomatoes and 1 cup of the chicken stock to the onion mixture. Bring the mixture to a simmer and cook, uncovered, for five minutes.

Remove 2 cups of the onion mixture to the food processor or blender and puree. Return the pureed mixture to the pan, add the chopped apricots, brown sugar and remaining 1 cup chicken stock and add enough liquid to make a medium-thick sauce.

Place half the sauce in a very large casserole dish. Add the hens, and cover with the remaining sauce. Bake, covered, for 30-40 minutes, or until done. Serves 12.

DRIED FRUIT COMPOTE

½ lb. mixed dried fruit (apricots, pears, peaches, prunes, figs)
1 tsp. freshly grated orange peel
½ tsp. freshly grated lemon peel
1 tbsp. honey, or to taste
1 orange, juiced
2 tbsp. chopped toasted almonds, or crumbled dry macaroons (optional)

In a saucepan, simmer the fruit in water to cover until soft, 15-20 min. Remove the fruit to a bowl, and cook the liquid in the saucepan until it's reduced to ½ cup.

Add the orange and lemon peels, honey and orange juice to the saucepan. Cook, stirring, until the honey has melted. Pour the mixture over the fruit. Leave at room temperature.

Just before serving, sprinkle the fruit with the almonds or macaroon crumbs, if desired. Serves 3-4.

ROSALYN TAUBER'S ORANGE MARMALADE BARS

¼ cup unsalted pareve Passover margarine
1 cup sugar
1 cup cake meal
½ cup plus 1 tbsp. potato starch
2 large eggs
1 cup orange juice
½ cup orange marmalade or strawberry preserves
1 tsp. cinnamon
¼ cup chopped nuts
1 tbsp. unsalted pareve Passover margarine, melted

Preheat oven to 350. In a mixing bowl, cream the margarine and ¼ cup of the sugar together until light and fluffy.

In another bowl, sift together the cake meal and potato starch and add to the margarine mixture. Stir gently until smooth.

In another bowl, beat together the eggs and orange juice. Add to the cake meal mixture, stirring gently. Grease a 9-in. square pan with margarine and lightly sprinkle potato starch on the bottom. Pour half the batter into the prepared pan. Spoon the marmalade or preserves over the batter and top with remaining batter.

In a small bowl, combine the remaining sugar, cinnamon, nuts and melted margarine and sprinkle over the top of the batter. Bake 30-35 min. Cool in the pan. Cut into squares. Makes 16 squares.

CARROT-APPLE PUDDING

5 large carrots, grated
2 medium apples, peeled, cored, and grated
⅓ cup raisins
3 egg whites, lightly beaten
¼ cup Passover oil
2 tbsp. sweet Passover wine
¼ cup packed Passover brown sugar (or white sugar)
1 tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. each: ground allspice, nutmeg and ginger

Preheat oven to 325. Combine all the ingredients in a mixing bowl. Pour into an oiled 9 x 5 x 3-inch loaf pan. Cover and bake for 45 minutes.

Uncover and bake another 40 to 45 minutes or until the top is nicely browned and crusty. Let cool. Slice and serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

LEMONY LEEK AND MUSHROOM SOUP

Stock:
7 cups water
1 cup chopped onion
green parts from 2 leeks, well washed
4 sprigs parsley
1 large celery stalk, coarsely chopped
2 vegetable bouillon cubes

2 tbsp. olive oil
4 large leeks, white and lightest green parts only, chopped and well rinsed
2 medium turnips, peeled and diced into ½-inch pieces
1 large celery stalk, diced
2 bay leaves
14½-oz. can tomatoes with liquid, chopped
12 oz. white mushrooms, sliced juice of 1 lemon, or more to taste
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
2 to 3 tbsp. minced fresh parsley
2 to 3 tbsp. minced fresh dill
matzah farfel for garnish, optional

Combine all the ingredients for the stock in a soup pot or large saucepan. Bring to a boil, then cover and simmer for 30 minutes. Let stand until needed, then strain before using. Heat the oil in a large soup pot. Add the chopped leeks and sauté over moderate heat, stirring frequently, until the leeks just begin to go limp. Add the stock, turnips, celery, and bay leaves. Bring to a boil, then cover and simmer for 10 minutes.

Add the tomatoes and mushrooms and continue to simmer until the vegetables are tender, another 15 to 20 minutes. Season to taste with lemon juice, salt, and pepper. Remove from the heat. Allow the soup to stand for several hours, or cool and refrigerate overnight.

Before serving, heat through as needed. Stir in the parsley and dill. If the vegetables seem crowded, adjust the consistency with more water, and then adjust the seasonings and lemon juice. Top each serving with a sprinkling of matzah farfel if desired. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

2 cloves garlic, minced
15-oz. can tomato sauce
14-oz. can plum tomatoes, drained and chopped

STRUB'S Pickle Corner STRUB'S

Vol. 1, No. 10 • March 18, 1999

Hello! How are ya'? What's cooking? On behalf of the entire Strub family, I would like to wish all of you a happy and Kosher Pesach. The Strubs have worked long and hard to bring you the best products for Passover and for every day. We are especially proud of our recently introduced Homestyle Gefilte Fish and Yom Yov Beet Horseradish. We try to make everything just like Bubie made. Enjoy!

Letter of the Month

Dear Pickle Guy,

What exactly is the difference between kosher pickles and regular pickles?

— "A true convert" (even though I subscribe to the Jewish News!), London, ON.

The Pickle Guy Replies

Dear "True",

In North America, just about all pickles are made "Kosher" and have a "Heksher" on the label. However, there is a flavour difference between "Dills" and "Kosher Dills". True Kosher Dills have lots of dill & garlic and no vinegar in them, and are found in the refrigerated section of your grocery stores. Some consumers do like pickles with vinegar in the brine. These pasteurized Kosher Dills are found on the grocery shelves, and do not need refrigeration until after you open the jar.

Fortunately, Strub's makes both kinds of Kosher Dills! Look for Strub's full and half sours in the refrigerated section, and Strub's Homestyle in the grocery section of your local grocery store. Thank you for your great letter and for being a true convert to Strub's pickles.

Remember, send your letters, pictures, and postcards to me:

slices and peel. Brush lightly with oil and broil on each side until tender. Heat the oil in a deep saucepan. Add the onion and garlic and sauté until golden. Add the tomato sauce, tomatoes, parsley, and seasonings. Bring to a simmer and cook over low heat, covered, for 15 minutes.

Break each matzah into three strips. Fill a shallow casserole dish with lightly salted water. Place the matzah strips in it for two to three minutes until pliable but not mushy. Remove carefully to a plate.

Preheat oven to 350 degrees. Lightly oil a large, shallow baking casserole and layer as follows: a thin layer of sauce, a layer of eggplant, a layer of matzah and a layer of cheese. Repeat. Bake for 35 to 40 minutes, or until the cheese is touched with brown spots. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

SAUTÉED CARROTS WITH ALMONDS

2½ tbsp. Passover margarine
2 lb. carrots, thinly sliced
¼ cup apple juice
1 tbsp. lemon juice
2 to 3 tbsp. minced chives
½ cup sliced almonds
dash salt

Heat the margarine in a large skillet. Add the carrots and sauté over moderate heat, stirring frequently, until crisp-tender and beginning to turn golden, about 10 to 15 minutes. If the skillet begins to turn dry, sprinkle in some of the apple juice while sautéing.

When the carrots are crisp-tender, add the remaining apple juice and sauté, stirring, until it is absorbed. Stir in the remaining ingredients, then transfer to a serving container. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

SWEET POTATO KUGEL

6 small sweet potatoes, peeled and grated
3 apples, peeled and grated
1 cup raisins
1 cup matzah meal
2 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup walnuts, chopped (optional)
1 cup fruit juice or water

In a large bowl mix all the ingredients together. Press the mixture into a greased baking dish and bake 45 minutes at 375 degrees, until crisp on top. Serves 12.

EGGPLANT CASSEROLE

3 tbsp. oil (or a mixture of oil and water to reduce fat)
1 large onion, chopped
1 medium eggplant, peeled and cubed
¼ cup diced green pepper
11 oz. tomato and mushroom sauce
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
2 large tomatoes, diced
1½ cups matzah farfel

In a skillet sauté onions in oil until tender. In the skillet combine the onions, eggplant, green pepper, tomato-mushroom sauce and seasoning. Cook, covered, for 15 minutes or until the eggplant is tender. Stir in the tomatoes.

In a 2-quart baking dish, arrange in alternate layers the vegetables and matzah farfel. Begin and end with the vegetables. Bake at 350 degrees (uncovered) for 25 minutes. Serves 8.

A brother and sister in Jerusalem enjoy a matzah snack.

Food Ideas for Passover

Frozen veggies can be dull until you add Mr. Potato

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

We've reached that time of year where the fall and winter vegetables such as squash and corn are gone, and the asparagus and green beans of spring are just starting to come in, but are still expensive. We're stuck with the canned or frozen types, and while we know they're good for us, they can be dull. What can we serve with our vegetables to make our meals a little more exciting?

Potatoes, of course.

Potatoes are a misunderstood vegetable. They are very high in vitamin C and potassium. In fact, just one medium potato has 45 percent of the vitamin C, and 21 percent of the potassium our bodies need every day.

Potatoes are also a great source of fibre. Just one serving of potatoes has 12 percent of the fibre we need every day. Potato skins also have nutrients. In fact, potato skins contain fibre, potassium, iron, calcium, zinc, phosphorus and B vitamins. One medium potato has almost three times more potassium than one medium orange.

GARLIC MASHED POTATOES

4 lb. red-skinned potatoes, unpeeled, quartered
½ cup butter or margarine, cut into pieces
1 cup finely chopped onion
3 tbsp. finely chopped garlic
1 cup Passover cream or non-dairy creamer

In a large pot cover the potatoes with salted water and cook until tender, about 20 minutes. Drain. Return potatoes to pot. While the potatoes are cooking, melt ¼ cup butter or margarine in large skillet over medium heat. Add the onion and sauté until it's traslucent, about three minutes. Add the garlic and sauté until tender, about three more minutes. Add onion-garlic mixture to potatoes. Add cream or non-dairy creamer and remaining ½ cup butter or margarine. With a mashing utensil, mash the mixture coarsely, stirring occasionally with a spoon to make sure that the onions and garlic are evenly mixed. Season to taste with salt and pepper and serve. Serves 6 to 8.

MASHED POTATOES WITH GREEN ONIONS AND PARMESAN

2 large russet potatoes (about 1¼ pounds), cut into chunks
2 tbsp. milk
2 tbsp. butter
1 bunch green onions, chopped
⅓ cup freshly grated Passover Parmesan cheese
Salt and freshly ground pepper

Cook potatoes in large pot of boiling water until tender. Drain well. Press the potatoes through a food mill or ricer into same pot or return to pot and mash (don't worry if you don't have a ricer or food mill, just mash them until they are very smooth). Mix in the milk and 1½ tablespoons butter.

Melt remaining ½ tbsp. butter in heavy small skillet. Add green onions and sauté until wilted, about one minute. Add to potatoes. Add the Parmesan and mix gently. Season with salt and freshly ground pepper and serve. Serves two. This can be doubled or tripled.

HORSERADISH MASHED POTATOES WITH CARMALIZED ONIONS

¼ cup plus 6 tbsp. (1¼ sticks) butter or margarine
2¼ lb. white onions, thinly sliced
3 tbsp. Passover balsamic vinegar
2 tsp. chopped fresh thyme
3½ lbs. russet potatoes, peeled, cut into 1-inch pieces
6 to 8 tbsp. whole milk or Passover non-dairy creamer
¼ cup prepared white horseradish

Melt ¼ cup butter or margarine in a large skillet over medium heat. Add the onions and sauté until they are a deep golden, about 20 to 30 minutes. Add the vinegar and thyme. Reduce heat to low; sauté for an additional four minutes. Meanwhile, cook potatoes in large pot of boiling salted water until very tender, about 20 minutes. Drain. Return to same pot; mash until smooth. Add 6 tablespoons milk or non-dairy creamer, horseradish and 6 tablespoons butter or margarine and stir to blend. Thin with 2 tablespoons milk or non-dairy creamer if necessary. Season with salt and pepper.

Transfer potatoes to serving dish. Spoon the onion mixture atop potatoes. (Can be prepared eight hours ahead. Cover with foil and refrigerate. Rewarm in 350F oven about 30 minutes.) Serve hot. Serves 6.

MASHED POTATO CASSEROLE

8 large potatoes, peeled
1-2 tbsp. onion salt
1 pint sour cream or plain yogurt
4 tbsp. butter, melted
1 cup grated cheese (Cheddar or Colby)

Cook the potatoes in boiling water until tender, about 20 to 30 minutes. Drain and then mash the potatoes with the onion salt and sour cream. Add the butter and mix well. Spray a 2-quart casserole dish with a non-stick vegetable spray. Place the potato mixture in the 2-quart casserole dish and press down slightly. Top the potato mixture with the cheese. Cover the casserole and refrigerate for at least an hour before baking. (This can be made a day in advance and baked just before serving). Bake at 350 for one hour. Serves 6 to 8.

.SHED SWEET POTATOES

.edium sweet potatoes, peeled
ınd diced (about 2½ lbs.)
up skim milk or non-dairy creamer, heated
tsp. salt

Food Ideas for Passover

Potatoes love parsnips

1 tbsp. packed brown sugar
1/8 tsp. nutmeg (optional)

Boil the diced sweet potatoes in enough water to cover for 14 to 16 minutes, or until tender when pierced with a fork. Drain thoroughly in a colander, until all water is gone. Transfer the potatoes to a large mixing bowl and beat on medium speed with an electric beater (not a food processor, or the potatoes will become gummy). Add the hot milk or non-dairy creamer, a few drops at a time, until the potatoes are smooth and fluffy. Add the salt, brown sugar and nutmeg and beat on high speed until very fluffy. Serve hot or warm. Serves 6.

LOW FAT MASHED POTATOES WITH GRATED CARROTS

3 lbs. all-purpose potatoes, peeled and cut into pieces
1 cup chicken broth
2 carrots, grated
3 tbsp. margarine
1/2 tsp. salt
4 scallions, sliced, optional

Place the potatoes in large pot of salted water. Cover and bring to a boil. Remove cover, reduce heat, and simmer 12 to 15 minutes, until the potatoes are tender when pierced with a fork. Drain well in a colander.

In the potato pot bring the chicken broth and carrots to a boil and cook for two minutes. Add the margarine and salt. Return potatoes to pot and mash until smooth. Place in the serving bowl and top with scallions. Serves 6 to 8.

ROASTED MASHED POTATOES WITH PARSNIPS

3 large russet potatoes (1 1/2 to 2 lbs. total) quartered
4 medium parsnips (1 lbs. total) peeled and cut into 1-inch chunks
1 cup chicken broth
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/3 cup Passover non-dairy creamer
3 tbsp. margarine
paprika

Preheat oven to 450. Place the potatoes, parsnips, broth, salt, and pepper in greased shallow baking dish. Cover with foil and bake for 45 minutes, until very tender. Remove them from the oven and cool slightly. In a small saucepan (or microwave) heat the non-dairy creamer and margarine together until the margarine is melted and the mixture is warm but not hot. Place the vegetable mixture in a bowl and mash it, adding non-dairy creamer/margarine mixture until the mixture is combined but still slightly chunky. Place in a serving bowl and sprinkle the top with a little paprika. Serves 6 to 8.

Grate your own horseradish for an eye-opening experience

By JANE ROSEN
Jewish Theological Seminary

On every seder plate there is a spot reserved for what is perhaps the strongest symbol of enslavement in Egypt: the maror, or bitter herbs.

Unfortunately, experiencing the sharpness of the bitter herb, and thereby comprehending the force of its symbolism, is blunted substantially by the reality that most people simply use a dollop of pre-grated horseradish, spooned out in an instant from a jar. (The rest of the jar typically languishes in the refrigerator until rancid and is then thrown away.)

For a truly eye-opening encounter with bitterness, try, as I did several years ago, grating your own from a fresh root. Now I'm hooked.

For starters, it intensifies the period of reflection for the person handling the task. And believe me, a dose of freshly grated horseradish is guaranteed to evoke a sense of bondage in everyone seated around the table. Before you do it yourself, though, let me offer the following tips.

- The root will lose its potency after one day, so buy a root just large enough for the seder, and cover immediately after grating.
- Begin by peeling the thick, ridged skin with a strong potato peeler.
- Don't even think about getting out the food processor; this operation is strictly manual.
- Do the grating outside – no need for explanation.
- Select someone who doesn't have a lot to do – it takes a long time to get a sufficient yield.

But note: For the faint-hearted among you, play it safe. Have the jarred stuff on hand, just in case!

Seminary cooks with new recipes

The media relations department of The Jewish Theological Seminary in New York sends along these recipes to wish you a Chag Kasher v'Samayach.

KATE'S MOM'S PASSOVER MANDEL BREAD

2 cups sugar
½ lb. butter
6 eggs
2¼ cups Passover cake meal
½ tsp. salt
¾ cup potato starch
12 oz. chocolate chips
1 cup chopped nuts
1 tsp. cinnamon with 2 tsp. sugar

Preheat oven to 350 degrees.

Cream sugar and butter. Add eggs one at a time, beating after each egg. Combine cake meal, salt and potato starch. Fold into cream mixture. Add chocolate and nuts. Mix well.

Form into two loaves. Sprinkle with cinnamon and sugar. Place loaves on a greased cookie sheet.

Bake for 45 minutes. Slice while warm. Note: You can substitute cocoa for cinnamon.

EMILE'S EGYPTIAN CHAROSET

1 lb. dates
2 lb. raisins
¼ lb. roasted hazelnuts, shelled and crushed
¼ lb. walnuts, shelled and crushed

Barely cover the dates and raisins with water and soak overnight. Do not use too much water. Cook until soft, about one hour in the original water. Strain cooked fruit and water through a hand strainer to make a solid paste. Make sure the tough skin separates from the fruit and remains in the strainer to be discarded.

Put the paste in a heavy pot over a low flame to allow any extra water to evaporate, turning occasionally with a large spoon. Remove from heat when the paste reaches a consistency that is not too watery.

Add nuts little by little to the paste. As the liquid paste cools, it will thicken. Charoset may also be garnished with extra nuts.

Kashruth Council recommends dessert

The Kashruth Council of Toronto provides recipes for each of the Jewish holidays. They are pleased to send along some of the Passover recipes they have prepared.

FROZEN RASPBERRY MOUSSE

1 10-oz. package unsweetened frozen raspberries, thawed
¼ cup sugar
2 egg whites
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. liqueur (optional)
garnish: chopped nuts (optional)

Combine all ingredients in large Mixmaster bowl. Start on low speed and gradually increase to high; beat on high for 10-15 minutes until pale, pink and stiff. Spoon into glass serving bowl or individual sherbet glasses and freeze. Remove from freezer when ready to serve. Garnish with chopped nuts, if desired. Delicious and refreshing.

APPLE FILLED ACORN SQUASH

1 acorn squash
2 tbsp. melted butter salt
cinnamon
¼ cup raisins, soaked in ¼ cup sweet wine or orange juice for 10 minutes
3 tbsp. butter
4 medium apples, peeled, cored and cut in ½-inch cubes
½ cup Passover sugar (if available)
1 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ tsp. ginger (optional)

Preheat oven to 350F. Halve squash lengthwise; remove seeds and stringy interiors. Trim undersides slightly so halves will sit flat. Brush cut surface with melted butter, sprinkle with salt and cinnamon. Place cut halves down in a large baking pan. Bake 30 minutes, then turn squash cut side up in baking pan. While squash is baking, soak the raisins to plump. In frying pan, melt butter, add apples, and cook for 5 minutes. Stir in sugar, lemon juice, ginger and soaked raisins. Fill squash cavities. Cover and bake 20-30 minutes or till tender. Serves 6.

Food Ideas for Passover

Pesach à la Sépharade

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL Ont. — You won't find horseradish on a Sephardi seder table, but it's not because Sephardim don't like spicy foods, says Moroccan-born Rabbi Amram Assayag of the Sephardic Kehila Centre.

Horseradish "didn't exist" in Morocco, he explained in a recent interview.

In its place for bitter herbs in Sephardi homes, you're much more likely to find romaine lettuce or endives.

An Ashkenazi Jew might have to look twice to recognize charoset prepared the Moroccan way, formed into a ball and rolled in cinnamon. Aside from the addition of banana, the traditional wine-apple-nut mixture, symbolizing the mortar used by the Israelites in Egypt, would taste much like its Ashkenazi counterpart.

The major difference, though, between Sephardim and Ashkenazim, when it comes to Passover food, is the Ashkenazi prohibition against kitniyot, including legumes, rice and corn.

Unlike the halachic prohibition against certain types of grains for Passover, the prohibition against kitniyot observed by Ashkenazi Jews is rabbinic.

"It makes life much easier for Sephardim," said the rabbi.

To make life simpler for Sephardim here, the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario and the Kashruth Council of Toronto recently agreed to introduce a new hechsher (pictured), authorizing food products containing kitniyot or kitniyot derivatives as Kosher for Passover (for Sephardim only).

KOSHER FOR PASSOVER

The best example, said Rabbi Assayag, is corn oil. "There's nothing chametz in it."

COR, the Kashruth Council of Toronto, understood the Sephardi community's needs, said the rabbi.

A similar arrangement was struck in Los Angeles last year, he noted. What makes Toronto unique is that the city has one central kashrut organization. Los Angeles has many rabbis giving their own hechshers, he said. A new one there wouldn't have the same significance it would here, he explained.

In cases of Ashkenazi-Sephardi marriages, the husband's food customs prevail, said Rabbi Assayag. Incidentally, he noted, Ashkenazi Jews can eat in Sephardi homes on Passover, as long as they don't eat kitniyot.

In Morocco, the traditional Jewish male's role would include inspecting the maror, checking each leaf one by one, and making sure the matzot were acceptable and not folded.

The women would prepare a variety of dishes. "It won't happen in a Sephardi home that you will have the same menu for two meals."

The night Passover is over, Moroccan Jews have Mimouna, an all-night event characterized by visiting home after home and eating symbolic foods, mostly sweets. Typically, the head of the home blesses his guests and gives them maror with honey, symbolizing the change from bitter to sweet.

But Rabbi Assayag's favorite Passover dish is lamb with truffles, which he remembers being picked fresh at this time of year in Morocco. Now, in Toronto, they can be purchased canned. In Montreal, he said, fresh truffles are imported. "That's the major delicacy of the chag."

Lemon curd adds zest to individual meringues

Preheat oven to 375 degrees. Brush oil on cookie sheet with pastry brush.

In a small skillet, heat oil over medium heat. Saute onion and garlic for 3-5 minutes or until wilted.

In a large mixing bowl, combine the potatoes, onions, potato starch, matzah meal, eggs, salt and pepper. Form into 12 balls and flatten each into a disc.

Divide broccoli into equal portions and place in the middle of each disc. Fold each disc in half to create a moon shape. Crimp edges to seal.

Place knishes on cookie sheet and brush with egg. Bake 15 minutes. Flip them over. Brush other sides with egg. Bake an additional 15 minutes.

This recipe yields 12 little treats.

INDIVIDUAL MERINGUES FILLED WITH LEMON CURD AND FRESH BERRIES

Meringues
6 egg whites
1 tbsp. potato starch
¼ cup sugar

Preheat oven to 275 degrees. Beat egg whites and potato starch together in a large bowl until stiff peaks form. Gradually beat in sugar until stiff glossy peaks form.

Line 2 cookie sheets with parchment paper. Draw 6 3½ inch circles on each sheet.

Drop approx. ⅓ cup meringue on each circle. Spread with the back of a spoon, make a depression in the centre to form shells.

Bake 1¼ hours. Turn off the oven, leave door closed and keep meringues inside for 1 more hour.

Lemon Curd
2 cups water
¾ cup sugar
1½ tbsp. potato starch
1 cup water
2 egg yolks
Juice of 1 lemon
1 tbsp. grated lemon peel
1 tbsp. butter or margarine
2 cups fresh raspberries, strawberries or combination

Bring 2 cups water to a simmer in bottom of a double boiler. Whisk together in top sugar, potato starch and 1 cup water until blended, about 2 minutes. Slowly whisk in egg yolks one at a time. add lemon juice, peel and butter or margarine and stir until thick. Cool.

Assembly
Fill each meringue with equal portions of lemon curd. Sprinkle berries over top.

גידי קורן וחברים

"אותו הים" :

ספרן החדש של עמוס עוז צופן בתוכו הפתעה מרעישה. כל מי שקורא לאורך השנים את ספריו של עוז מצפה לרומן קלאסי, שכתיבתו מאד ממושמעת, נקיה, קאונית. לא בכדי הפך לסופר הישראלי המתורגם והנקרא ביותר בעולם. לצידם של הרומאנים הבלתי נשכחים שלו ("מיכאל שלי", "קופסא שחורה" ואחיהם), פרסם עוז מספר לא קטן של ספרי מאמרים ומסעות. וחלקם ממש עיצבו את החשיבה הישראלית. למשל, בתחילת שנות השמונים הוא הוציא ספר "מפה ושם בארץ ישראל" וראיין ישראלים בכל חלקי הארץ. שם קראנו לראשונה ראיון עם מושביניק שמוכן היה לשים ערבים במטוס ולזרוק אותם מעל הים. האשימו את עוז שהוא ממציא שנאת ערבים, אלא שכעבור שנים מעטות כבר היתה בכנסת מפלגה שבמצעה מדובר על טרנספר של ערבים.

הספר "אותו הים" שמונה לצד מיטתי שונה לגמרי. על פני מאתיים עמודים הוא מספר את סיפורם של אב מזדקן, אשתו שנפטרה מסרטן, בנו שמטייל בהודו ובטיבט וחברתו של הבן שנשארה בתל אביב. אבל זה לא רומאן, זה ערבוב של קטעי שירה, קטעי פרוזה, חלומות ומחשבות שכתובים כאסוציאציות חופשיות. זה מאפשר לעוז לא להיות מכופתר, להיות מצחיק מאוד, עצוב מאוד, אירוטי מאוד, זקן מאוד - הכל לפי הזדמנות. זהו ספר מדהים. עוז יצר בו סגנון כתיבה חדש, שלא היה עדיין כמותו בישראל. התגובות היו נדהמות גם כן. המשורר מנחם בן התפעל מהשירה הנפלאה שעמוס עוז אף פעם לא שיתף אותנו בה. סגנון הספר מאפשר לעוז להיות אחד המשתתפים בו, בתור המספר , והוא משתף את הקורא בילדותו, בבגרותו, ובמצבו הנוכחי . הינה קטע על ילדותו בירושלים, שבו הוא מגלה לקורא שהמשוררת הנפלאה זלדה היתה מורה שלו:

"בירושלים, ברחוב זכריה, בדירת שני חדרים , בית ספר פרטי שייך למרת יונינה. מורתי גברת זלדה, זלדה שכעבור שנים כתבה את שירי השוני המרהיב והכרמל האי נראה, פעם אחת ביום חורף, מצאה להעיר לי ברוך: אם תפסיק לדבר אולי יוכלו הדברים לדבר לפעמים אליך".

רציתי להביא לכם עוד הרבה עמוס עוז, אבל המקום צר. פשוט שימו יד על הספר הזה ותקראו אותו לאט, כמו ששותים יין טוב שאין הרבה ממנו. אל תשלו את עצמכם - אם אתם ישראלים מעל גיל עשרים, לא תמצאו פה או בשום מקום עמוס עוז מקומי שיחבר אתכם לשפה שלכם, לנוף שלכם , ולמה שהשארנו מאחור.

קולין ג'יימס - מוזיקה מקפיצה :

אם בא לכם לשמוע משהו שיקפיץ את עצמותיכם המזדקנות בזמן הנסיעה לעבודה במכונית הקפואה שלכם - אז הינה, יש לי הצעה: קולין ג'יימס Colin James זמר - מוסיקאי טורונטאי. לתקליט שלו קוראים The Small Big Band ואני ממליץ על החלק השני (Volume 2) אלה הם שירי רוקנרול משנות השלושים, ארבעים וחמישים בביצועים של שנות התשעים. מה זה מדליק! אחרי דקה תתחילו לחייך, ואחרי עוד דקה תתחילו לרקוד על המושב, וברמזור הראשון - החיים כבר ייראו לכם אחרת. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Israel angry over EU statement on Jerusalem

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials are up in arms regarding a statement from the current leadership of the European Union that questions Israel's sovereignty over Jerusalem.

During its weekly meeting last Sunday, the cabinet rejected what it said was a European Union (EU) challenge to Israeli control over all of Jerusalem.

The EU stand questions long-established facts on the ground, the ministers agreed during the meeting, adding that they oppose any partition or internationalization of the city.

The issue erupted after Germany's ambassador to Israel, Theodor Wallau, last week wrote a letter to the Israeli Foreign Ministry about the status of the city.

Wallau, whose country currently holds the rotating EU presidency, stated that the European Union considers Jerusalem a separate entity from Israel under the terms of the 1947 partition plan.

Because of this position, he added, EU diplomats are not forced to comply with Israeli directives in the city.

Wallau was responding to a letter issued last month by the Foreign Ministry requesting that foreign diplomats not meet with Palestinian Authority officials in the capital.

The letter reminded the diplomats that the future of Jerusalem is to be determined in final-status negotiations, and that the Oslo accords bar the Palestinian Authority (PA) from conducting business in Jerusalem.

In recent years, Israel has repeatedly called on foreign envoys not to meet with Palestinian representatives at Orient House, the Palestinians' de facto headquarters in eastern Jerusalem.

Orient House

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with Wallau on Sunday to express Israel's displeasure with the EU stand.

Netanyahu told the ambassador that the "clock would not be turned back" and that Jerusalem would never be partitioned again.

Officials at the German Embassy later said the ambassador was merely reiterating the EU position on Jerusalem, which has long been known to Israel.

The dispute comes against the backdrop of PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's plans to declare an independent Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital.

The PA's governing bodies are expected to meet next month in the self-rule areas to decide whether Arafat should declare Palestinian statehood in May.

The 125-member Central Committee and the 18-member Executive Committee are expected to review the recommendations from American and European leaders that Arafat postpone the declaration past May 4, the end of the interim period in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations under the terms of the Oslo accords.

Netanyahu has stated that Israel will annex portions of the West Bank if Arafat unilaterally declares statehood.

Speaking to students in Beit Shemesh last Sunday, Netanyahu again warned the Palestinian leader against such a move.

"If you act unilaterally, we will respond unilaterally," he said.

IT'S YOUR MOVE

Arafat to visit Canada

OTTAWA — Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat will come to Canada as soon as details of the trip can be finalized, a Palestinian official said last week.

It would be Arafat's first visit to Canada.

Bakr Abdul Menem, head of the Palestinian mission to Canada, said he was instructed by Arafat to prepare for a Canadian visit.

During his recent trip through the Middle East, Canada's Minister of International Trade, Sergio Marchi, invited Arafat to visit.

Arafat is expected to press Canada to upgrade the Palestinian mission in Ottawa closer to the status of an embassy. Canada recently opened a representative office in Ramallah.

A Canadian official was quick to note that Arafat's visit would not be accorded the status of a full state visit. It would most likely be a working visit, the official noted.

Haredi poverty called growing problem for Israel

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Rushing back to class along the twisting alleyways, a yeshiva student named Yishayahu, breaks the midday quiet in Mea Shearim, Jerusalem's haredi neighborhood.

Like most of his peers, Yishayahu, 24, studies full time and does not work.

"None of the yeshiva students I know work," Yishayahu, the father of two, says, sporting an otherworldly smile behind his reddish beard and sidelocks.

"Making money in this world just isn't important to us. It's the world to come that really counts."

This sanguine attitude, shared by most people in Israel's haredi community, could lead to an economic crisis that may soon come crashing down on the serenity of a lifestyle devoted to tireless study.

Furthermore, say economists who have studied the haredi community, the crisis could extend beyond the boundaries of Mea Shearim and similar sanctuaries, to Israeli society as a whole, with increasing poverty and a growing strain on local and national funds.

Many Haredim reject the doomsday scenarios, confident that pursuing a life of study is the ideal.

In 1997, Ruth Klinov and Eli Berman, economists from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Boston University respectively, shocked Israeli economic experts with a study on Israel's labor force that revealed alarming data on the haredi community.

According to the study, Israel – now often compared to developed markets – has the lowest rate of workforce participation in the developed world.

Non-participants are defined as people who either choose not to work or cannot work because of disabilities. They are not included in unemployment data, which only counts those who are actively seeking employment but cannot find a job.

Israel's rate of participation in the work force for men between the ages of 25 and 54, fell from 93.5 percent in 1970 to 85.7 percent in 1993. In western Europe and the United States, the rate was about 94 percent in the early 1990s.

Klinov says that the rapid growth of non-working yeshiva students accounts for about one-third of the decline. Indeed, other studies show that the number of haredi yeshiva students has doubled from 35,980 in 1990 to more than 72,000 in 1997 – 1.2 percent of Israel's population of six million.

The growth of the yeshivot coincides with the growing political power of the Haredim and increased national funding for haredi institutions.

It also comes as Israel is struggling to revive its economy after a three year slow-down. Economic officials say this can only be done by reducing the level of transfer payments, such as significant government support of yeshivot, and increasing public sector investment in infrastructure projects that create jobs.

Meanwhile, secular Israelis are angry that this largely non-working sector of society pays virtually no taxes, or other dues to society. Exemptions from military service for yeshiva students, for example, have been a perpetual sticking point in religious-secular relations.

Klinov and Berman's study concluded that military exemptions are the main reason why Israeli yeshiva students do not work, since the minute they start working, they lose eligibility for a military exemption.

"The problem is that ultra-Orthodox non-participation is not cyclical," says Klinov. "It is permanent and increasing at a geometric rate."

Indeed, in another study being discussed at a conference at Tel Aviv University, Berman says the proportion of haredi men not working has climbed from 41 percent in 1980 to more than 60 percent in 1996.

Israel's haredi community numbers some 350,000 today, or about six percent of the population.

Berman says the population of Israel's haredi community will double every 17 years.

There is no sign of a change in these trends. In fact, even though birthrates in other sectors of Israeli society, including the fast-growing Arab community, are slowing down, haredi families are having more babies than ever before.

The average number of children per mother in the haredi community has climbed from 6.5 in the early 1980s to 7.6 in 1996.

But the average monthly income for the family of a full-time yeshiva student was $1,150 below the poverty line and less than half the income of an average Israeli family.

While taking care of the children, haredi women generated 17 percent of this income. Another 39 percent comes from the yeshivot and 32 percent from government child allowances.

These allowances are paid to all Israelis, but are higher for Haredim because they have more children.

If these birthrates continue, as they are likely to, by 2010, predict the economists, 10 percent of Israeli children will have a father who is a yeshiva student and does not participate in the workforce.

"The rise of this community endangers its economic mode of existence because they have a much higher birthrate and they work less and less," says Berman. "Whatever the form of support, whether it is from the state or from contributions from abroad, there is a limit. The funding simply cannot double itself every 17 years."

In Berman's newest study, called Sect, Subsidy and Sacrifice: An Economist's View of Ultra-Orthodox Jews, he writes: "The ultra-Orthodox growth rate will make Israel's welfare system insolvent and bankrupt municipalities with large ultra-Orthodox populations." This is due to the large child subsidies, which are included in the welfare system.

Jerusalem and B'nei Brak near Tel Aviv are the cities with the largest haredi populations.

Berman believes that if a secular government cuts off funding or an economic recession threatens funding from abroad, the community will not be able to immediately integrate into the work force. This could prove a social time bomb for the haredi community and for Israel.

Some Haredim reject the gloomy projections.

Avraham Ravitz, a Knesset member from the United Torah Judaism bloc, and chair of the parliamentary finance committee, says the economists have missed the mark, since most Haredim simply do not need money.

"The ideal is to live modestly," says Ravitz. "They don't go out to coffee shops or to eat out, and they only buy the bare necessities."

Ravitz himself says he has been involved in initiatives to start vocational training programs for yeshiva students. He also believes that if they were forced to, most yeshiva students would probably go to work.

• Labor Party leader Ehud Barak was cleared of blame in a state inquiry into a 1992 army training accident that killed five commandos and left six others injured, according to Israel Radio. While the report has not yet been made public, a legislator involved with the inquiry said it absolves Barak of blame. Barak, who was army chief of staff at the time of the incident, has been the target of repeated allegations that he fled the scene of the accident without attempting to help the injured. "Barak Fled," has been used by the Likud Party as a campaign slogan.

• Yitzhak Mordechai, the centrist party candidate for prime minister, pledged to support the growth of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. "Settlement is crucial for controlling the land and preserving the homeland," Mordechai said.

• Ha'aretz reported that the Likud party hopes to capitalize on the European Union's letter of support for internationalizing Jerusalem. Ha'aretz said Likud would cite the letter as proof of the dangers facing the city, and present Prime Minister Netanyahu as the only candidate capable of of defending Jewish sovereignty over all of Jerusalem.

• Shas leader Aryeh Deri told the French weekly Le Nouvel Observateur that he believes a national unity government, formed after the elections, will agree to return the Golan Heights as part of a peace treaty with Syria.

In an interview published in France, Deri also said the formation of a Palestinian state is only a matter of time: "A Palestinian state will be established. That's for sure.

"There are only minor differences between the Labor party and the Likud party regarding the question of the future borders between us and the Palestinians."

Jerusalem visit nixed

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — American government officials told a group of U.S. researchers and former generals attending a conference at the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies that they could not go to the Golan Heights or the Old City of Jerusalem as part of the conference itinerary, because they are occupied territories.

A U.S. Embassy spokesperson confirmed the ban, although he said it did not come from the embassy.

The spokesperson said that since 1967, there has been an official ban on U.S. officials travelling to the territories accompanied by Israeli officials. For example President Bill Clinton cancelled a planned visit to the Western Wall because Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert insisted on attending.

The spokesperson acknowledged, however, that the Jaffee Centre is not a government agency, but rather an academic institution affiliated with Tel Aviv University.

The military experts and researchers will go to Masada instead of on the previously planned trips to the Golan and Jerusalem.

The conference opened last Sunday with a speech by Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz on the IDF's long-range strategic aims. Among the participants in the U.S. delegation are the director of the U.S. Army War College, General Robert Scales, and several retired senior generals.

At the last minute, American authorities also refused to give permission for any of the visiting generals to be interviewed by members of the press during their stay.

Syria to arm Iraq

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Syria has secretly agreed to supply military equipment to Iraq, according to Middle East intelligence sources quoted in the London Times.

The deal between the Syrian and Iraqi intelligence services will involve military equipment worth some $100 million, the sources said.

Under the agreement, Syrian spare parts for military equipment would be converted for use by the Iraqi army, the sources said. The parts would include engines for Russian-made tanks and tracks for armored fighting vehicles.

Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has faced a severe shortage of spare parts for his army as a result of the international arms embargo imposed after the 1991 Gulf War.

Syria is also expected to supply equipment for anti-aircraft radar facilities – hit by recent U.S. and British bombing – as well as trucks, aircraft, helicopters and ammunition.

Relations between Syria and Iraq, once considered regional archrivals, are reported to have improved significantly in recent months.

MWU named in suit

By PAUL LUNGEN

TORONTO — The repercussions of the 1997 Maccabiah Games bridge tragedy keep unfolding.

The first civil suit related to the bridge collapse was filed recently in Israel while Maccabi Australia has announced it is on the verge of bankruptcy due to accrued debt related to the tragedy.

Sasha Elterman, a 17-year-old Australian tennis player who was poisoned by her fall into the polluted Yarkon River, is suing 19 parties, including organizers of the Maccabiah Games, the State of Israel and the city of Ramat Gan.

Elterman was one of dozens of Australian athletes and officials who fell into the river when a bridge collapsed as athletes paraded towards Ramat Gan Stadium during the Games' opening ceremonies.

Four people were killed and many injured in the mishap.

The lawsuit claims Elterman suffers from headaches and weakness and has difficulty walking and concentrating.

"There are days when she can't get out of bed," her Israeli lawyer, Pinhas Saltzer, is reported as saying. "They're trying to take her to school for an hour every day, but it tires her terribly."

Since the bridge collapse in July 1997, Elterman has undergone almost 30 operations to relieve the effects of a fungus she ingested in the Yarkon. The fungus, for which there is no known cure, has infected her lungs and brain.

Saltzer claims expenses related to her injuries have reached close to $3 million U.S. and may yet increase.

Roy Salomon, president of Maccabi Canada and a senior Maccabi World Union (MWU) executive, declined to comment on the suit, saying only that "Sasha Elterman is a very courageous young lady and all of us continue to pray for her recovery."

March 9

• An Arab woman was named Miss Israel for the first time in the nation's history. "I am totally Israeli, and I do not think about whether I am an Arab or a Jew," 21-year-old Rana Raslan, from Haifa, said at the pageant.

• Palestinian police shot dead two Arab teenagers when protests erupted in the Gaza Strip after a Palestinian court passed a death sentence in a politically charged murder case.

• The Israeli embassy in Moscow said it is alarmed by the "dangerous trend" of growing Russian anti-Semitism. The embassy issued the statement after a synagogue in Novosibirsk was vandalized. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is scheduled to visit Moscow in two weeks.

March 11

• The Palestinian Authority (PA) blamed Israeli soldiers for the death of at least one of the two teenagers killed during yesterday's violent confrontations with Arab demonstrators. March 12

• "Israel will make no concessions in Jerusalem," said Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon. He reacted to a formal letter from the European Union (EU) reconfirming its support for an international regime for Jerusalem and rejecting any Israeli limitations on EU diplomats meeting with PA officials there.

Poland to take jurisdiction over Nazi camps

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Polish cabinet met last week to discuss a proposed bill that would bring Nazi concentration camps and other sites of Jewish martyrdom under the control of the national government.

The bill, if it becomes law, would remove control over Auschwitz-Birkenau, Majdanek, Stutthoff, Sobibor and other murder sites from local governments and create "spheres of protected zones" around them, said Andrej Przewoznik, secretary-general of the Consul for Preservation of Remembrance of War and Martyrology.

"The most important thing is that for the first time, the bill introduces regulations for the preservation of these [places]," he said.

Speaking through an interpreter at the Polish consulate, Przewoznik said the bill makes no specific reference to the controversial field of 239 crosses situated outside the main camp at Auschwitz. The presence of the crosses has been a sore spot for Jewish survivors of the camp. Ninety percent of the more than one million victims of Auschwitz-Birkenau were Jews.

Przewoznik declined to predict whether the bill, which he described as a "priority" item for the government, would lead to the crosses' removal.

But Nate Leipciger, a Canadian representative on the Auschwitz-Birkenau International Council, said he was assured by Polish president Aleksander Kwasniewski in February that all the crosses would be removed, except a single large "Papal Cross" that commemorates the Pope's visit to the death camp.

Leipciger, who also heads the national Holocaust Remembrance committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the bill will give the national Polish government jurisdiction over the camps and a 500-metre "quiet zone" around them. That should defuse a smoldering situation that has pitted local residents and business people in the Polish village of Oswiecim (Auschwitz) against survivors' groups and Jewish organizations.

Leipciger said Carmelite Sisters have leased property adjacent to Auschwitz to "a hard line nationalist and outspoken anti-Semite." He, in turn, permitted another individual supported by skinheads to erect the crosses.

The sub-tenant also plans to erect a shopping mall next to the death camp to take advantage of the large number of visitors to the historic site. Any such development can hardly be expected to be in keeping with the solemn nature of the camp, Leipciger suggested.

However, the bill empowers the national government to expropriate property in the area surrounding the camps, a power Leipciger expects Polish authorities to exercise.

Leipciger said passage of the legislation should lead to substantial changes around Auschwitz. Not only does he expect the crosses be removed, but the Auschwitz-Birkenau Advisory Council is suggesting the current restaurant, flower shop, bookstore and bus stop should be moved outside the camp perimeter. In addition, the council would like to see creation of an educational facility just outside the main camp, he said.

Plans to switch legal control over the Nazi concentration camps and the areas immediately surrounding them have been percolating in Polish government circles for some time and were not connected to the cross controversy, Przewoznik maintained. The proposed legislation is not limited to Auschwitz, but affects a number of locations in Poland where an estimated two million Jews were killed, he said.

Przewoznik, who has held his position for seven years, said the bill recognizes "it is the duty, not just of Poland, but of all people to preserve these sites. They have to testify as to what happened there.

[These] are meant to be educational sites, not only for Jewish and Polish society but for Europe and the world so that never again such things can happen."

Przewoznik suggested the bill should help create "a better understanding and intensify the dialogue" between Poles and Jews.

"We talk all the time about the past, but we have to also build a future," he said.

"The educational aspect is very important. Auschwitz-Birkenau should serve to educate the younger generation of Poles and Jews. This will help create a more intensive dialogue," he suggested.

But Leipciger is not convinced the disputes over Auschwitz will end with passage of the bill. "It will address the problems we have now, but there are still lots of interest groups that have different agendas. It doesn't mean that other groups will lie down and play dead. The rightist extremists are not just going to go away."

Sharansky given rough reception at Reform convention

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Natan Sharansky, Israel's minister of industry and trade, encountered hostility last week at a meeting of world leaders of the Reform movement.

Sharansky initially was greeted warmly when he arrived to address the World Union for Progressive Judaism's 29th annual convention in Jerusalem.

But seconds after taking the podium, a rabbi hurled insults at the former Soviet Jewish dissident, who was an icon in the struggle led by U.S. Jewry to free Soviet Jews during the 1970s and 1980s.

"He's been voting against us all the time," shouted Rabbi David Liliental of Amsterdam. "He owes us and he's betrayed us."

Rabbi Liliental was referring to support given by Yisrael Ba'Aliyah, the immigrant party that Sharansky leads, to Orthodox-backed legislation in the Knesset that Reform Jews say delegitimizes liberal Jews.

Sharansky replied that Haredi cabinet ministers have been accusing him of not backing their cause strongly enough, and said he was "proud of his role" in building bridges among religious streams.

But many of the 250 Reform rabbis and community leaders attending the conference from around the world, said they were disappointed when Sharansky failed to address the issues that have been straining Israel-Diaspora relations.

Instead, he talked about a recent trip to Russia.

At the end of his address, another participant shouted: "Why did you vote that we are not rabbis? Why did you vote for the conversion bill?"

Sharansky said he was in favor of dialogue, but did not want "legislation or the Supreme Court" to decide the issues.

The hostile atmosphere put a damper on what the Reform movement hoped would be a festive occasion, as it presented Sharansky with the first-ever Russian-language Reform prayer book.

Only a small portion of the crowd cheered when he left.

In contrast to Sharansky's cool reception, Amos Oz, the secular Israeli author, drew cheers as he repeated a recent pledge to join the Reform movement in its struggle against the Orthodox.

He also charmed the crowd with insights on the pluralism conflict, peppered with humor and literary language.

Oz said the heated debate between religious and secular Jews was actually a healthy manifestation of traditional Jewish culture, and will never spark a "full-scale civil war" like those that had devastated Europe and the United States:

"I don't think Israel is going to give the world this horrible spectacle," he said, adding that in 50 years, "this will be the world's most popular city for a healthy argument."

Oz also urged the Reform movement to refocus its struggle on providing an alternative to "a deep-seated emotional and intellectual stagnation" that he feels characterizes haredi Judaism today.

He said the battle for equal rights would not be won only in the Knesset or Supreme Court, but through education.

Ontario govt. launches Alzheimer strategy

MISSISSAUGA, Ont. — The government has disclosed an overall plan for dealing with Alzheimer disease.

A draft of Alzheimer strategy, a multi-faceted initiative on Alzheimer disease and related dementias was recently released by Cam Jackson, minister of long-term care with responsibility for seniors.

"This is the first time any government in Canada has recognized the need for an overall strategy on Alzheimer disease," said Jackson. "The Alzheimer Society of Ontario and many other organizations across the province have been our active partners and we thank them for their invaluable assistance in developing this plan for action."

The 10-point draft strategy was released last week at the Sam McCallion Alzheimer Day Centre.

The strategy focuses on: annual staff training for front-line long-term care workers; a new physician training program; an increase in public awareness, information and education; planning for appropriate, safe and secure environments; more respite services for caregivers; research into caregiver needs; advance directives for preplanned personal health care choices; new psychogeriatric consulting resources; coordinated specialized diagnosis and support; and an intergenerational volunteer initiative.

"This strategy means more support and more resources for those living with Alzheimer disease and their families," said Jackson. "The government is taking action to deal proactively with this very serious disease which affects more than 100,000 Ontarians directly and one million indirectly."

The action plan is designed to improve earlier diagnosis of Alzheimer disease and to help support family caregivers. The unique nature of respite care for people who live with Alzheimer disease is recognized.

The government plans to implement the recommendations following a brief public review period, which ends April 6. Input from the public, community groups and Alzheimer organizations is encouraged. The feedback will result in a final strategy to be released later this spring. All comments should be sent directly to Jackson.

"We are delighted with the draft strategy, as it addresses the key concerns raised by our members," said John Carriere, president of the Alzheimer Society of Ontario.

Controlling stress said essential

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Under stress, a nutritionist tucks into a plate of mashed potatoes, and a psychotherapist develops a bad back, just like his father before him. A CBC-TV news anchor says he needs stress to get an "excited edge" in his voice.

These were the examples heard by an audience of 400 attending the healthy living series, given by Mount Sinai Hospital at the Leah Posluns Theatre of the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Fran Berkoff, the nutritionist, Dr. Ari Zaretsky, the psychotherapist and Lorne Saxberg, the news anchor and panel moderator, all agreed that stress is necesssary in life, but needs to be controlled.

The crowd of office workers who head for the coffee shops first thing in the morning, is an indication that some are suffering from lack of sleep, said Zaretsky, underlining the need for a good night's sleep of six to nine hours.

It's not just combat veterans who suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder, which is being seen more and more often, said Zaretsky, head of Mount Sinai's cognitive behavior therapy clinic.

A healthy diet, aerobic exercise, breathing exercises, yoga, massage and acupuncture can be helpful for all kinds of stress, he said.

Men who have had heart attacks and then suffer from depression, are at a much greater risk for a fatal attack, he said, adding that depression is still the most untreated disease, especially in men.

Holistic medicine is such a hot topic, that four out of 10 residents of the United States spent a total of 27 billion on the medicine in 1997, but only three out of 10 told their family doctor, Dr. Zaretsky said.

"My concern is not that [the medicines] don't work, since scientific studies are being done which show they are effective, but my concern is with their safety. What reaction does the brain have to these chemicals? There may be side effects. Talk to your family doctor first."

An "exercise buddy" is one way of keeping motivated to do aerobic or other exercises, said Denise Lai, a Mount Sinai physiotherapist.

Exercise pumps endorphins into the bloodstream, and this relieves stress, said Lai.

People should put a beeper into their computer, or write an entry in their daytimer, to remind them to have lunch, said Berkoff. "It is important to make time for food," she said.

She advised eating lots of complex carbohydrates such as bread, rice and pasta, and enough proteins. She added that people who eat fruits and vegetables are helping their immune systems, and are usually healthy.

Only people who are not eating well, need vitamins, she said.

"Don't diet. If you cut down 100 calories a day, you will lose 10 pounds in a year, "said Berkoff.

In the discussion period, Zaretsky said that attention deficit syndrome is more often due to genetics than stress, and said that he doubted that it affects more than five per cent of the population.

There is no evidence that the long-term use of anti-depressants is unsafe, he said.

The panelists and moderator were given golf shirts so they would exercise.

Carol Seidman, hospital vice-president, was chair.

Israeli malls help Azrieli fulfill business dream

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — When Canadian developer David Azrieli wrote a $70-million (US) cheque to the city of Tel Aviv in 1992 for a 200-year lease on land that had served as a depot for garbage trucks and municipal waste, he knew exactly what he was doing.

Azrieli was starting to build his fourth enclosed shopping mall and office complex in Israel, and taking risks were part of the challenge when he first set his sights on Israel several years earlier.

"I realized that there were different cultural considerations to keep in mind. However, geographical and cultural differences were not going to prevent me from fulfilling my dream of getting involved and participating in the economy of Israel. I set out to fulfil my goals with great anticipation," Azrieli told a recent gathering of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce.

Azrieli, who began his career building four houses in a Montreal suburb, first introduced the idea of an enclosed shopping mall to Israel in the early 1980s. However, applying a proven commercial development formula from North America, to the Mediterranean, was no easy task.

The banks and government were skeptical, there was skyrocketing inflation, the financial system was undergoing a "severe crisis" and there was extensive red tape.

Moreover, prior to Azrieli's first shopping mall in Ramat Gan which opened in 1985, Israeli retailers bought their store units. There was no history of leasing retail space – a major principle of an enclosed mall.

"The purchase of retail space had led to a haphazard tenant mix, shoddy merchandising and a loss of control in the day-to-day operations of Israel's commercial centres," said Azrieli.

With each challenge overcome, Azrieli looked for another. Having established a new way of doing business in Ramat Gan, Azrieli then looked to the desert town of Beersheva for his second project, not a likely site for an enclosed shopping mall.

David Azrieli

"The resounding success of the first mall in Israel led me to take another initiative – to build a mall in the desert town of Beersheva. Once again, there was widespread skepticism about my choice of location," said Azrieli.

Over time, "The mall helped transform this formerly sleepy town into the metropolis capital of the Negev."

Three years later, in 1993, Azrieli's third development opened, this time in Jerusalem. It quickly started drawing foreigners such as Jordanians and Egyptians, in addition to the local Israeli and Arab populations. It is the largest shopping centre in the Middle East.

Azrieli said the introduction of enclosed shopping malls in Israel shaped different aspects of doing

NEW LOCATION FOR JEWISH FILM FEST

After six years at the Bloor Street Cinema, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival has announced a change of venue. The 7th annual festival takes places April 29 to May 6 at the Cineplex Odeon Hyland Cinemas, on the east side of Yonge Street north of St. Clair.

Since the Hyland has two screens, festival organizers have almost doubled the number of films being shown. More than 60 features, shorts and documentaries are being screened this year, as compared to 35 last year, many of which were sold out.

"They'll be more repeats, and we'll be showing two Yiddish films this year, not just one," said festival director Shlomo Schwartzberg, as he was put finishing touches to the new program, due for release in full this week.

A frequent complaint of festival-goers in previous years has been that the seats at the Bloor Street Cinema were old and uncomfortable. The Hyland's seats, by contrast, should make it much easier for attendees to sit through a double bill.

The festival is scheduled to open with The Dybbuk of the Holy Apple Field, an Israeli film that, according to Schwartzberg, "can best be described as Romeo and Juliet meet The Exorcist." It was completed in 1998 at a cost of $3 million (US), making it the most expensive Israeli film ever made.

The festival is also screening Photographer, a powerful Polish-made documentary about the Lodz Ghetto, using a recently-found set of photographic stills taken by a Viennese accountant. "It gives a sense of what the ghetto was like," Schwartzberg said.

Another highlight of this year's festival is Buzz, a recent film by Israeli director Eli Cohen, who also directed Summer of Aviyah. Buzz tells the true story of two Israeli teenagers who committed murder for thrills – a well-known case in Israel.

Restored versions of two Yiddish films – The Singing Blacksmith, and The Light Ahead – are also on the festival program. The theme of this year's fest, which includes more Israeli films than ever before, is Jews from Distant Lands.

Festival passes are on sale now through March 29 for $90, and afterwards for $99; festival programs are due to be mailed out in early April. For details, contact the box office, 324-8600.

As a fund-raising event, the Producers Group and Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem present a screening of The Harmonists at the Hyland Cinema, March 25, 7:30 p.m. The film tells the story of a group of six young singers, three of whom are Jewish, winning such popular success in Germany that they are unwilling to take Hitler's rise to power seriously.

Tickets are $25 each, and include admission to a post-screening party. 324-8600.

Tickets for this fund-raising event are $99, and only 200 are available. Imperial Room, Royal York Hotel, April 1. Doors opens 7 p.m., with plays at 8, 9 and 10 p.m. 703-0406.

Entrepreneurial educator operates three business schools

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO—Frustration with what she saw as the lack of facilities available for her 16-year-old daughter led Esme Gotz into the field of education.

Today, Gotz is the director of three campuses of the Toronto School of Business.

To help her daughter and others with learning disabilities, she founded the Springfield School for Girls, a private facility for teenage girls. She explained that Springfield School was closed after five years as government legislation was in favor of "mainstreaming," which made it difficult to operate private schools like Springfield.

"I had become hooked on schooling," she says. "I missed that high of seeing someone break through barriers and achieve levels of confidence that they, and their families, never thought possible."

When the opportunity for a Toronto School of Business franchise presented itself in 1985, she opened her first campus in Oshawa. She has since opened branches in Pickering and in Cobourg.

The schools have become a major trainer and private post secondary training institution. "With more than 600 students on three campuses and a staff of more than 65," she says, "we are also a major employer in [Durham] region."

She notes that at the beginning, "I did everything – admissions, banking, payroll, name it, I did it. I learned an important skill: how to select competent people, and give them the trust. Now my job is to oversee."

The schools have grown, she noted with pride: "When we started in 1985, we had five IBM computers. We now have more than 400." She notes that every discipline needs access to computers and internet.

Most of the students are 22 to 30. "With the recent government cutbacks and with the downsizing of companies, many people in their 40s and 50s are returning to school for upgrading or seeking more current skills."

The schools have numerous diploma programs in business, computers, hospitality, office administration, health care and recently a department of computer animation was established.

"For me, one of the most rewarding aspects of operating the schools has been seeing the numbers of our students who have made lifestyle changes, gone on to good jobs and advanced to management positions. Some have also become employers, who call our Employer Services staff whenever they need personnel."

Gotz grew up in an entrepreneurial family in leather goods and plastic manufacturing in Johannesburg. She earned a degree in sociology and worked in the family business. She and her husband came to Canada in 1964 with their three children, Ruven, Julia, and Avril.

Gotz is a past president of Toronto Women's ORT and in 1995 and in 1997, was nominated as Oshawa Chamber of Commerce Business Person of the Year.

Novelist depicts women's shtetl life away from it. Women had sex, and they liked it. The Singers and Aleichems never talked about female libidos.

Neither did they delve deeply into how women prayed. Nattel was fascinated by the discovery of prayers for women, called techinas. Women prayed in Yiddish, and asked God to guide them through childbirth, nursing and health for their children, but also so that their husbands would not lose themselves to drink and other women while on a business trip.

Nattel came from a largely non-observant family, but from a home that was permeated by stories, songs and customs from the old country. Both of her parents are Holocaust survivors. Her grandmother's second husband used to recount tales from a place called Blaska. "I could never find it on a map," Nattel says. "It may have existed at one point, or maybe not."

It looks like Nattel isn't worried about being pigeonholed as a "Jewish writer." She is hard at work on her second novel. Set in Chicago and east-end London at the end of the 19th century, it will explore Jewish heritage in a modern, pluralistic setting. A planned third novel "will be a Jewish book, because I'm a Jewish writer."

Ultimately, the author bemoans the loss of the shtetl's sense of community.

"We're all in need of figuring out how to form a community when there's so much impermanence and movement," she says. "We live in a society that emphasizes consumerism; the big house, the big car. [But] our sense of obligation should go beyond making a living. Sometimes, it takes a crisis to make people realize we need more than that."

Aelita's act is very versatile. Her revues can be cabaret, swing Hollywood, '50s, Russian, Israeli and lots more.

TORONTO — The term "internationally-renowned star" can be overused by publicists in the showbiz industry. But it does seem to apply to singer/ performer Aelita.

After all, not only has the Toronto resident performed in the United States, South Korea, Israel, Germany, Cyprus, Russia and other international venues, she also sings in 16 languages.

Chinese and Korean are amongst the hardest languages she has sung in, she says. "Those are very difficult, but the language itself acquires a melody. Before a Chinese concert, I listen to Chinese radio stations all day," to learn pronunciations and nuances.

Aelita says no matter what the language, she will always learn the meanings of the lyrics of all the songs she sings. "There's a whole world out there and I want to make a connection with its people and cultures. If I sang only in English I'd be robbing myself and my audience."

Learning languages through song is not entirely a new concept for the Latvian-born chanteuse. Growing up, she supplemented her English classes by listening to English songs.

These days Aelita is on the road a lot with either her 20-piece orchestra or her full retinue of dancers and performers.

Her act is very versatile. Her revues can be cabaret, swing, big band, broadway, Israeli, French, '50s, Hollywood, Russian – there's very little she can't do.

Just take a look at her itinerary. She'll be doing her swing revue this June in Scarborough, her From Russia With Love set in the United States in November, she's booked for a Mediterranean cruise in May and she's performing at the Four Seasons here with her 20 piece orchestra New Years Eve.

"Nobody else in Canada does this," she says. "It is more difficult though [than specializing in one genre]. For example, if you sing Yiddish, people think you can't do rhythm and blues." She says she can't be labeled and "people ar blown away by that."

Her revues are huge produc tions with lavish costumes an dancers. And they're the sam dancers she uses whether it's he From Russia With Love set or he Jerusalem Revisited (which sh performs at the Israel pavilion fo Caravan.)

"Their talent has to be very broad," she says of her versatile performers. "And if they have the talent they will want to keep learn ing different things. It's no good t think you know it all."

Russian revue includes acrobatic cossack dancers

Her Russian revue consists of "all the gems of Russian music;" acrobatic Cossack dances and traditional Russian songs as Midnight in Moscow, Kalitka, and music from Dr. Zhivago.

Even though she was raised in Latvia, which was occupied by the former Soviet Union for almost 50 years, Aelita has no problem celebrating Russian culture.

"Russia is a beautiful country with lots of talent and soulful music. What was good was good – the bad was anti-Semitism and lack of freedom – but I was brought up on wonderful music, books and culture."

Aelita has firsthand experience with anti-Semitism. In Latvia she was beaten up because she was Jewish and she remembers vividly her grandmother shutting the curtains when she lit the Shabbat candles.

She recalls what it was like during the height of Soviet paranoia in the ,'60s and how difficult it was to listen to Frank Sinatra and Ella Fitzgerald. "We used to get Voice of America but it was always jammed." So she used to go to the seaside with her radio and fiddle about with the antenna trying to tune the station in.

Always interested in singing, she won a talent contest when she was 15 and performed in Moscow. However, she wasn't allowed to perform outside of Russia (even in a Soviet bloc country like Bulgaria) because "they knew I had relatives in the States and I was an escape risk."

As with other Refuseniks, her life was hellish after she and her mother applied for exit visas. "For eight months we couldn't work or do anything."

It is with bitter irony that Aelita, who's done so well on the international level, faces hurdles almost reminiscent of Soviet-style bureaucracy when it comes to performing for the Jewish community here.

"Toronto is my home and I wish I can do more for the Jewish community – I'm not doing enough." But, she says, various event organizers always think it's better to "get someone from New York," than a local performer.

"It's funny because I do Jewish events even in South America. This makes me sad, it's something I would love to do for my soul."

Even performing in her favorite language – Yiddish– is problematic here. Her appeals to such events as Ashkenaz and Yiddishland Cafe have mostly been rejected. "They say I'm not hip enough," she says. "They say my songs have all been done before."

And while she's willing to learn new songs, she's not willing to compromise her style. "When I do a Yiddish concert it's an expression of my experiences in Latvia and all the repression I suffered," she says, her eyes visibly tearing up. "They do not recognize that I am the grande dame of Yiddish music."

You can sample her diverse forms of music on her new CD Around the World in 60 minutes,which is a compilation of songs from her different revues including Edith Piaf's La Vie En Rose, the Russian traditional classic Kalitka, Marlene Dietrich's wartime hit Lilli Marlene and a Yiddish version of My Way.

And they say she isn't hip.

You can order the CD from Ten International 905-731-6942.

Azrieli launched Israel's 'Canions'

business in that country, including banking, marketing and retailing. Azrieli takes credit for introducing the word Canion to Israeli society, which combines the word shopping and parking.

The concept of a shopping mall created a more positive atmosphere for customer relations. "The development of the Canions throughout Israel helped change prevailing attitudes towards consumers; the interaction between merchant and customer came to be characterized by mutual respect and cordial relations,"said Azrieli.

Another major change was with the introduction of leasing instead of buying retail space.

With centralized mall management (for such items as maintenance, cleanliness, operating hours and tenant mix), "The North-American-style shopping mall in Israel liberated the store owners from investing their capital in the purchase of stores, thus allowing them to use their resources to concentrate on what they do best – selling and merchandising," explained Azrieli.

Azrieli's crowning achievement in Israel is the massive development that bears his name, The Azrieli Centre, located in Tel Aviv. His firm was selected from an international competition of 21 firms to develop the eight-acre site.

Also called the Hashalom Project, the development has three office towers (42 stories, 46 stories and 50 stories), a two-level shopping mall, a landscaped plaza, recreation centre, entertainment sites, a hotel and a four-level parking facility that accommodates 3,600 cars. Phase I opened in March 1998, and the full project is to be completed by the end of 1999.

Azrieli said that the development is quickly becoming the Fashion Boulevard of Israel accommodating 30,000 to 40,000 pedestrians each day.

In a veiled hint that there might be a fifth project in mind, Azrieli said, "Consideration for the future is a very important element in making investment decisions in Israel, for we must remember that it is a young country with a greater deal of potential that has yet to be fulfilled. Personally, I am honored to have been called a "pioneer" in the realm of real estate development in Israel. The pioneering days are not over."

Maccabi Canada names new Ontario chair

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Paul Wise

TORONTO — They say good things come to those who wait, but more than 30 years passed between Paul Wise's first encounter with Maccabi Canada and his current role with the organization.

But the onetime high jumper is back big time. Wise has been named co-chair of the Maccabi Canada's Ontario region. He shares the post with Ira Kaufman.

Back when he was a younger man, Wise was less interested in bureaucracy and budgets than in athletics and competition. An accomplished sailor, hockey player and high jumper, Wise played Varsity hockey at Boston University and could clear more than six feet as a jumper. In the mid-60s, he was slated to join Canada's Maccabiah team, but just before the team left for Israel he was told it couldn't afford a stand alone high jumper.

Naturally disappointed, he nevertheless didn't give up on the organization. Prior to the 1997 Games, he learned that sailing had been designated as a Master's event for athletes slightly past their prime.

Wise agreed to test his skills in a Laser, a beginner's boat usually associated with young and light athletes. Although "it was hairy out there" in the Mediterranean's eight-foot seas and he didn't do so well coming downwind, the competition in Israel "was a wonderful experience. I saw what the Maccabiah does and I saw Jewish youth from around the world connecting in the way they did. It was very moving for me.

"I was so overwhelmed, I committed to get at it and work with this organization."

Maccabi Ontario's top man has experience at the executive level in his B'nai Brith lodge and in the arts and entertainment division of the United Jewish Appeal.

Wise is staking out an ambitious agenda for Maccabi Ontario, in part by creating a more permanent structure for the organization. He plans to recruit new people and bring back those with Maccabi blood running through their veins.

"I sensed there had to be a building program in Ontario by calling on the strongest team members we could recruit," he said.

"I had sensed there was a huge network of people with ties to the Maccabi organization. My goal is to reach back and to embrace them into the Maccabi fold. They all know about the Maccabiah experience first hand."

Former Maccabi Canada president Sidney Greenberg "is coming back on the Ontario region board" as are Elliot Wahle and Irv Ungerman. Lewis Allen has been named Ontario sports chair and Gerry Berman is Maccabi's new treasurer.

With the cost of sending one athlete to Israel hovering around $5,000 (300 are expected to go in 2001), fundraising remains one of Wise's top priorities. Raising the organization's profile in non-Maccabiah years is part of his solution. An annual golf tournament and a concert or other entertainment event are being considered. Sponsoring bingos and organizing an alumni event are other items on his agenda.

Wise is enthusiastic when it comes to singing the praises of the Maccabiah ethos.

For those who will wear Canada's colors at the 2001 Games in Israel, the Maccabiah Games "are all about creating a better life for Jewish youth through sport and to create a lasting link to Israel," he said.

New fundraising event planned for hockey star

TORONTO — A recent fundraiser for ailing ex-Soviet hockey star Viktor Zhluktov proved so successful, organizers are planning to do it again.

This time, instead of an autograph-signing session, the public is invited to a celebrity sports dinner and charity auction at Rosa's Place Restaurant, 2201 Finch Ave. W. at 7 p.m.

Toronto Maple Leaf winger Sergei Berezin will be on hand to greet well-wishers and sign autographs. He'll be joined by Slava Fetisov, ex of the Stanley Cup champion Detroit Red Wings and currently an assistant coach with the New Jersey Devils.

The two Russian hockey players will make brief comments and answer questions from the audience, said Gennadi Kuran, one of the event's organizers. The dinner is sponsored by the Russian Hockey Players Association and the Russian Hockey Place in Canada. Tickets are available for $68, which includes dinner and a sports souvenir.

Proceeds from the event go towards bringing Zhluktov, a onetime member of the powerhouse Soviet national teams of the 1970s and '80s, to the Ichilov Hospital in Israel for surgery to correct a debilitating spinal injury (CJN Feb. 25).

No other hospital has agreed to perform the surgery, Kuran said. However Zhluktov, who lives on a $25 (US) monthly pension, cannot afford the $35,000 (US) cost of the surgery. His friends in the West are attempting to raise funds to send him to Israel for the operation, Kuran added.

About $5,000 was raised on Feb. 28 at an autograph session at Centerpoint Mall in which all five Russian Maple Leafs participated. The event attracted hundreds of people, beyond organizers' expectations, some of whom donated $100 to aid the former Soviet star, Kuran said.

For tickets and information about the celebrity sports dinner, call Rosa's Place at (416) 745-2222 or the Russian Hockey Place in Canada at (416) 264-5513.

The Inside Back

Between a rock and a hard place

As readers of this column are aware, I have a great deal of criticism for the Israeli courts. In my opinion, the system is breaking down on many levels, while at the top of the pyramid, Supreme Court President Aharon Barak practises a form of "judicial activism" which, I believe, is not always justified and in some cases, actually causes damage to the rule of law.

You may be surprised, therefore, to learn that I attended the recent counter-demonstration in Jerusalem to express support for Barak and the court.

I would not bother to waste this space with my personal, political opinions, but I do believe that an analysis of recent events surrounding the court is important for a proper understanding of Israeli society and its relationship to the law.

The counter-demonstration of which I speak was a reaction to a demonstration against the court being organized by the haredi community.

In theory, the haredi demonstration was meant to simply be a meeting of prayer against what is perceived in that community as the anti-religious bias of the court. While reports differ, about 200,000 people came out to protest and express the opinion that their needs are not understood by the court.

The haredi protest was a legitimate expression of opinions. What it really involved, however, was a threat against the court, and a call to politicize it, by appointing judges based on their religious and political views and not on their judicial abilities.

North Americans are familiar with this argument in another form, i.e. that the courts have historically been a bastion of Christian white males who do not represent society.

There is a parallel situation in Israel, where the majority of the Supreme Court is made up of secular Ashkenazi jurists, many of whom come from academia and who do not seem in touch with society.

For that reason, among others, I also oppose extreme judicial activism.

The court should not be making policy, and many of its decisions in recent years seem to involve an attempt to "correct" what the judges perceive as negative trends in politics and the Knesset. The techniques for doing this include creating new rights and standards which have no basis in legislation or a constitution. In effect, the court is making policy, and while in many cases it is fighting against phenomena which are offensive and anti-democratic, I am not sure that it is fulfilling its role properly.

Having said that, the argument that the court has no right to make value judgments also indicates a lack of understanding of its job. When a petitioner approaches the court to decide an issue, anything the court does – whether it accepts the petition, rejects it or even refuses to decide, is a value judgment.

Take for example the issue of Conservative conversions. The parents of several adopted children converted by Conservative rabbis petitioned the Supreme Court to force the Interior Ministry to register the children as Jews. The court has done everything in its power to postpone making a decision and refer the issue back to the political sphere, among other things by initiating the establishment of the Ne'eman commission.

If the court accepts the petition, it will be accused of interference in the realm of religion and the state. However, deciding against the petitioners, or even refusing to decide, would be a value judgment in favor of the status quo. Thus, the court is often thrust into sensitive areas and has no choice but to decide.

The solution to the problems surrounding the court is not to politicize it and turn it into a reflection of the Knesset, nor is it to delegitimize it or intimidate it into silence. Doing so will lead Israel onto a slippery slope which could be fatal to democracy in this country.

There is plenty of room for reasoned, respectful criticism of the judges. However, when it comes down to it, the current situation is preferable to some of the alternatives being bandied about, and I therefore had no choice but to express my support for one of the bastions of freedom and democracy in Israel.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband planned another evening with our friends Esti and Jerry without consulting me. They are wonderful good-hearted people, but by the time the night is over, I'm usually ready to scream.

Esti is the kind of person who always has to top whatever you're discussing. Her kids do cuter things; her dog is smarter; her husband works harder; her job has more pressure; and her hairdresser and mechanic are the best. There isn't a story that can be told that she doesn't interrupt with the words: "You think that's something, well listen to this..." I can't take a whole evening of her. I know one day I will blow up, and I feel it coming soon.

My husband and Jerry are good friends and my husband doesn't have a lot of close friends. I don't want to put a damper on their relationship by starting an argument with Esti. Any suggestions?

Better Than Nothing

Dear Better Than Nothing

It seems to me that you are putting yourself in an unnecessary position. You are probably a wreck after an evening with Esti, and very close to exploding, which is not what an evening with friends is all about.

It is very commendable of you to endure the company of a person you seem to dislike for the good of your husband's social life; however, by suppressing yourself through each and every conversation, you are really not doing anyone a favor.

Do you think your husband wants to go out knowing you are miserable? Does he have any idea how you feel? My guess is he wouldn't put you through this if he had an inclination of your dislike for Esti.

First of all, inform him of your feelings and let him know that you think it's great that he and Jerry get along so well, but in future to please make plans that don't include you – especially without your knowledge. Maybe he can take Jerry to a hockey game and ease into a one on one relationship that way.

Give your husband more credit, discuss it with him and I'm sure he will understand.

Israel, Ukraine sign pact

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MOSCOW — Israel and Ukraine signed a defence memorandum in Kiev on Sunday, the first of its kind between the two countries. The memorandum includes cooperation between the defence industries and the transfer of security information.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, accompanied on his first trip to Ukraine by Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, met Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma and Prime Minister Valery Pustovoitenko to discuss cooperation and other issues. The two leaders also agreed to sign a treaty on avoiding double taxation and to work out measures to protect Israeli investments in economically struggling Ukraine.

The countries' bilateral trade amounted to $174 million in 1998, up 39 percent from 1997. Israeli investments in Ukraine, however, totalled a meagre $12.6 million (US).

Following the brief visit, Netanyahu arrived in Moscow Sunday for talks aimed at boosting ties and airing concerns about leaks of Russian nuclear technology to Iran. The prime minister was due to meet today with Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov and Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov.

Netanyahu's first stop was at the Choral Synagogue in the centre of Moscow, where he and Sharon spoke to members of the Russian Jewish community. Netanyahu praised the contributions of Russian Jews who have immigrated to Israel, saying their professional skills constituted "the main factor of progress in Israel."

Netanyahu warned of the growing anti-Semitism in Russia, calling it a threat to the Russian nation as well as to Jews. "What starts with

Church targets Russians

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The makeshift sign outside Yorkview Heights Baptist Church in north Toronto touts another congregation, Beth Sar Shalom, in three languages: English, Hebrew and Russian.

In the church's basement, about 60 men, women and children are assembled for Saturday morning services. It's an eclectic crowd. Young and old mix with several black and Oriental faces. Children look intently at brightly-bound Bible stories for kids.

"Shabbat shalom!" announces the spiritual leader, Larry Rich, who heads Chosen People Ministries, an organization that's long been accused of trying to convert vulnerable Jews to Christianity. The service gets under way with prayers sprinkled with references to "Hashem Yeshua" (Lord Jesus), and spirited singing and clapping is accompanied by live violin.

A prayer is said for the State of Israel, and worshippers ask God to come to the aid of persecuted Christians around the world, especially those who are spreading the "Good News" of the Gospels.

Congregants later shake hands with their neighbors. The CJN reporter is greeted by a boy around 11 who wears a kippah and whose tzitzit hang out from his oversized suit jacket.

Special Report

But more telling is a young mother who admonishes her children to keep quiet – in Russian. In fact, there's quite a bit of Russian being spoken in the pews.

Is there is a disproportionate number of Russian Jewish emigres who are drawn to messianic congregations like Beth Sar Shalom? And do these congregations, which blur the line between Judaism and evangelical Christianity, deliberately target Russians, who may be easy pickings because of their vulnerability?

Jews for Judaism, the countermissionary organization, believes both to be the case, and it has set up a Russian Task Force to counter what it says is an alarming increase in the number of Jews from the former Soviet Union who are joining deceptive "synagogues" which worship Jesus as the Jewish messiah.

Jews for Judaism says Toronto is a "hotbed" of Christian outreach to Russian Jews, who tend to arrive with little if any affinity to Judaism and often with no family already here to help them get acculturated. Messianic congregations, many of which distribute printed material in Russian, are scooping them up in record numbers, Jews for Judaism charges.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Hate On The Internet

TORONTO — Human rights activists, law enforcement officials and interested Canadians gathered last week for the second International Symposium on Hate on the Internet, sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada. The conference examined free speech issues associated with the promotion of Internet hate, as well as strategies employed around the world to eliminate it. With a potential audience of 50 million Internet users worldwide, the computer is rapidly replacing conventional modes of communication for purveyors of hate propaganda, B'nai Brith stated.

Walkathon In Rwanda

TORONTO — Carole Ann Reed, director of education at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, and Alan Simons, Rwanda's honorary consul general in Ontario, are scheduled to travel to Rwanda in July to take part in the first Walk for Hope in the capital, Kigali. The international walkathon will raise funds for projects to support children who survived the country's 1994 genocide. The two-week trip is jointly organized by the Hope for Rwanda's Children Fund, a registered Canadian charity based in Toronto, and its partner in Rwanda, the Tumurere Foundation. For more information, call 416-609-8580.

CJA Drive Up

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign raised $4.2 million in 1998, an increase of six percent over the year before, community officials announced recently. Of the total, nearly $62,000 was allocated to Lower Mainland agencies. Another $85,000 was earmarked as a special gift for overseas and local agencies.

ISRAEL

Rabin Centre Planned

JERUSALEM — The widow of Yitzhak Rabin last week unveiled plans for Israel's official memorial to her slain husband. Leah Rabin said the Yitzhak Rabin Centre for Israel Studies will function as an educational facility, archive and museum "in the grand tradition of American presidential libraries." She said a main garden at the facility will be dedicated to the memory of Jordan's King Hussein.

Grieving Families Meet

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian families whose children have been killed in the Middle East conflict gathered last week to share their experiences. The families, brought together under the auspices of the Israeli group known as the Parents' Circle, met with Israeli President Ezer Weizman and former prime minister Shimon Peres, and visited a Jerusalem high school. They plan to meet together next month in the Gaza Strip.

WORLD

Chechen Blames 'Zionists'

MOSCOW — The leader of the Russian breakaway republic of Chechnya has accused "Zionists" of trying to topple him from power. Speaking last week to 50,000 supporters in the capital of Grozny, Aslan Maskhadov said those opposing his rule are acting on instructions from "international Zionist centres."

Spain, Austria To Pay

NEW YORK — Spain and Austria have agreed to contribute a total of some $10 million to a fund assisting Holocaust survivors, the countries' foreign ministers announced separately last week in New York. The fund, using gold the Nazis looted from European countries they overran, but never returned by the Allies after the war, now totals about $60 million. The fund has already paid for medicine and other humanitarian needs for survivors in the former Soviet Union, according to the World Jewish Congress.

Primakov Meets U.S. Jews

WASHINGTON — Russia's prime minister has agreed to meet with representatives of the American Jewish community during a scheduled visit to Washington this week. The National Conference on Soviet Jewry, which arranged the meeting with Yevgeny Primakov, plans to discuss concerns about rising anti-Semitism in Russia.

War Crimes Trial Starts

ZAGREB — The commander of Croatia's largest World War II concentration camp proclaimed his innocence at the start of his war crimes trial here this month. "I absolutely do not feel guilty, not for a single charge," Dinko Sakic said after hearing the 35-page indictment, which charged him with the deaths of some 2,000 people.

In 1944, Sakic was head of the Jasenovac concentration camp, where an estimated 600,000 Jews, Serbs and Gypsies were killed during the war.

Church To Help Shul

NEW YORK — Saint Thomas Church in New York is holding a March 28 benefit concert to raise funds for a nearby synagogue. Since a five-alarm fire devastated the Central Synagogue last summer, congregants have been holding services in their community centre across the street. Restoration of the synagogue is expected to be completed by the end of next year.

No Prosecution Of Communist Anti-Semite

MOSCOW — Russian prosecutors are refusing to launch a criminal investigation of a Communist party lawmaker for a statement that was widely interpreted as a call for anti-Jewish pogroms.

According to the prosecutor's office, a speech made by Albert Makashov last month "was not aimed at inciting ethnic strife."

Speaking at a conference sponsored by the nationalist group known as the Movement in Support of the Army, Makashov said, "Jews are brave. They are so brave because we are sleeping, because none of us has yet knocked on their door."

A hard-line Communist legislator, Makashov said there are "good Jews" and "bad Jews." The "good [ones] will continue to live," while the "bad [ones] will have a hard time."

He also suggested the group, which he leads, should change its name to the Movement Against Yids.

This month, the Russian parliament's scheduled vote on a motion aimed at censuring Makashov was blocked by the Communists, the largest single group in the house.

Makashov recently announced that he will make a bid for the Russian presidency when elections are held next year.

Swiss fund allots $300 per survivor

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An estimated 7,000 Holocaust survivors living in Canada will each qualify for about $300 (US) from the $2.5 million allotted to Canada from the Swiss humanitarian fund.

The cheques will all be sent out around the beginning of August. In the meantime, officials will check the applications for which a spring deadline – May 24, 1999 – has been set.

The estimate of 7,000 is less than half of the 16,000 to 18,000 survivors thought to be in living Canada, according to records which are not completely accurate. The number of Canadian applicants is in line with that in the United States where less than 30 percent of survivors have applied.

The amount finally paid out to each needy survivor will depend on how many applications are received; the estimate of 7,000 people each receiving $300 (US) is just an educated guess, said Rabbi Gunther Plaut, chair of a Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) committee of survivors.

"We will get the money distributed as fast as we can," he said. Rabbi Plaut, 86, and 10 other committee members from across Canada are not applying for the funds, which are intended for needy survivors.

Valid applications will not be audited or investigated as the committee feels that the question of need must be determined by the individual survivors, he said.

"We know that many survivors

Mutual trust, no politics

As I wrote last week in this space, Canadian Jews should take an active interest in the conversion institute that opened last week in Israel under the joint auspices of the government of Israel and the Jewish Agency for Israel. The institute is officially called the Institute for Jewish Studies and its mandate is to prepare candidates for conversion.

The functional and stylistic "architects" of the institutes were Ya'acov Ne'eman and his six colleagues who comprised the Committee to Develop Ideas and Proposals in the Matter of Conversion in Israel appointed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu some 22 months ago.

Finally, after a great deal of resistance by the Orthodox establishment, the institute has been created.

The Jews of Canada have helped bring the institute into existence. Through our donations to our local UJA/CJA and UIA campaigns, we directly support the institute, its program and its values. In doing so, we are taking an unambiguous stand on behalf of intra-communal civility, tolerance and respect.

But what exactly is its program? And who are the decision makers whose onerous responsibility it now is to try to help the institution take root in Israeli soil and grow into a vital, life-sustaining part of its Jewish landscape?

Mirroring the number and religious affiliation of the people who served on the Ne'eman Committee, there are seven members on the institute's board of directors, five Orthodox, one Reform and one Conservative.

The chairman of the board and the effective head of the institute is Prof. Benjamin Ish-Shalom. If he had no other credentials, his name alone would qualify him for the post. But Ish-Shalom does have other credentials too.

Born in Israel, Ish-Shalom studied at Yeshivat Hesder Har Etzion, served in the armored corps of the IDF and is the founder and rector of the Centre for Advanced Jewish Studies, Beit Morasha of Jerusalem.

Avraham Duvdevani, an Orthodox board member, is the head of the Settlement Division of the World Zionist Organization and a member of the National Religious Party and of the Bnei Akiva national executive.

Ayera Dashevsky, the third Orthodox board member, graduated from the Moscow Higher Institute for Education, the Machanayim Institute Moscow-Jerusalem and Touro College. Miriam Katrosky is Dashevsky's alternate on the board.

Rabbi Yaacov Medan, the fourth Orthodox member on the board, was born in Jerusalem. He is a graduate of Netiv Meir Yeshiva and of the Har Etzion Hesder Yeshiva in Gush Etzion.

Dr. Amnon Shapira is the fifth Orthodox director. He is a member of Kibbutz Tirat Zvi, a graduate of Bar-Ilan University and the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in New York. Shapira is a teacher in the regional high school of the Beit Shean Valley and a senior lecturer at Bar-Ilan University. Rabbi Shmuel Reiner is his alternate.

The Reform member on the board is Rabbi Michael Boyden. He was born in London, England. Rabbi Boyden is the spiritual leader of the Ra'anana Reform Congregation. His alternate is Rabbi Meir Azari, the Haifa-born chair of the Reform Rabbinical Council in Israel.

The Conservative representative on the board is Rabbi Prof. Reuven Hammer, a graduate of Yeshiva University and the Jewish Theological Seminary and Northwestern University and currently professor of rabbinic literature at Schecter Institute of Jewish Studies. Rabbi Hammer's alternate is Rabbi Prof. David Golinkin, dean of the Rabbinical School and Associate professor of Jewish law at the Schecter Institute of Jewish Studies.

I have devoted an inordinate proportion of this column's space to identifying the institute's board of directors and to briefly sketch their credentials. The reason I have done so is to demonstrate that the board is a highly talented group, representative of a wide religious swath of the Jewish world and deeply committed to the work, the symbolism, the mandate and the hope of the institute.

The institute will be run according to five agreed-upon principles:

- the acceptance of mitzvah as a central and committing principle in Judaism;
- the acceptance of the classic texts – Bible, Talmud, and the body of halachic thought – as the common basis shaping Jewish existence in all its varieties;
- an "adopting" shomer mitzvot family and a religious kibbutz community that will respectively sponsor and accompany each student;
- the study program to be taught in a unified manner, explaining and representing the different streams;
- emphasis on kashrut, family purity, Shabbat and traditional religious education as well as interpersonal relationships.

The program devotes 440 hours of lecture and discussion per student.

One of the first decisions the board made was to affirm that they will undertake their work on the "basis of mutual trust, the [avoidance of] politics, and function solely on pedagogic considerations." May they succeed. MBD

Annual NCJW Passover food drive kicks off

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 16th annual Passover Food Drive, run by National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), Toronto section, kicked off this year with opening ceremonies designed to raise community awareness of the project.

The food drive is Council's largest service project, said Roz Fine, Toronto section president.

Each box includes a Haggadah (available in English or Russian), candles and food items such as a frozen chicken, matzah, soup mix, gefilte fish and cookies.

Over the last several years, about 2,000 boxes a year have been distributed, said Rebecca Ber, co-chair of the food drive with Charlene Arje and Bonnie Dale.

About 25,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto area live below the poverty line, Ber told The CJN.

In 1984, concurrent with an influx of Jewish immigrants from the Soviet Union, NCJW initiated the project to meet the needs of clients of Jewish Family & Child Service and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, she added. That first year, 300 boxes were delivered.

These days, NCJW also fields referrals from Circle of Care, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the Reena Foundation, the Board of Jewish Education, rabbis and physicians.

The drive, which is supported by Mazon Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress, reaches between 3,000 and 5,000 recipients a year, but there are "many more that are in need, and we need to make sure that everyone in need gets those foods," said Arje. She urged Council and community members present to stay involved, give of their time and donate food or money to the project.

Arje also emphasized the community aspect of the food drive, which brings together people from across the denominational spectrum. Every year students from Reform, Orthodox and Conservative schools help pack boxes. "I really believe it teaches values and the importance of tzedakah in Judaism," said Arje.

"As our social welfare system gets leaner, it gets more difficult for those who have little to begin with, to survive with dignity," said educator Selma Sage, filling in as keynote speaker for Rabbi Elyse Goldstein who was out of town for a family brit milah.

The food drive serves seniors, singles, newly arrived immigrants, and those receiving financial assistance, with discreet and special consideration to anyone in need.

"All of these people are counting on you, on me, on us," Sage said. "We cannot let them down."

Last year over 4,500 people were serviced by the Passover Food Drive, according to an NCJW news release. The number is expected to be significantly higher this year.

The cost of last year's drive was over $40,000. Over 1,000 volunteers were needed to sort, pack, and deliver food.

If someone asks for food, you are not allowed to question it, she said. "Our tradition reminds us that deeds of loving kindness have the highest priority of all."

After the formalities, community members and food drive supporters spent time packing boxes.

The food drive continues until Mar. 26. Delivery of boxes will take place Mar. 28.

feel that the money is coming to them for what they went through, but we would ask them to remember that any money they take means less for the people in need."

A total of 4,600 requests for applications have already been received, said CJC director of finance and operations Abe Smajovits, who spoke to The CJN from Montreal.

Survivors who have legal guardians are eligible for the payout as long as the applications have the proper proxies, he said.

Ads are being placed across Canada, with different details in each region, announcing the May 24 deadline. The ads tell survivors where to pick up applications. A batch of 2,500, now being printed, should be available by the end of March.

A toll-free-hot line, 1-877-252-6555, is open to anyone who wants to request an application.

The ad running in this issue of The CJN is sponsored by the CJC, World Jewish Restitution Organization, Swiss Fund for Needy Victims of the Holocaust/Shoah and UIA Federations of Canada

Rabbi Plaut expressed regret that the Swiss humanitarian fund came along too late for the survivors who have died.

Those survivors who were little children in the Nazi regimes, will now be in their mid 60s, he pointed out.

- You are a citizen, a permanent resident or other legal resident of Canada
- You are in need: meaning that wherever you live, you are having financial difficulties meeting your basic needs such as housing, food, clothing and additional health care

The modest amount to be paid to each person will depend on the total number of needy applications approved.

Any eligible individual in Canada wishing to apply must submit a completed application to the address listed on the application form so that it is received prior to May 24, 1999.

Transfer health services, Harris asked

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In pursuing a promise by Premier Mike Harris to make health services available to all students, the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE) is asking that the services be transferred from one ministry to another.

The transfer from the Ministry of Education to the Ministry of Community and Social Services (MCSS) would get around the Education Ministry's refusal to fund independent, religious schools.

This rationale will be presented to Janet Ecker, minister of Community and Social Services, at a meeting later this month, Henry Koschitzky, chair of OJAEE, told the executive of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

This can best be accomplished through the MCSS Community Care Access Centres, he said. These centres coordinate services to children who have been assessed by the board of education as having special needs other than "learning difficulties."

Koschitzky said his committee is not dropping the fight for funding for Jewish day schools, which the premier has turned down for the present, but is concentrating on the health services issue.

In another matter, Lorrie Goldstein, Toronto Sun editor, said many Jews are "dynamic, controversial people," and that is why there is so much Jewish news in the media.

Examples of such "high rollers" are Mayor Mel Lastman and Sun Media chief Paul Godfrey, he said.

"When you are a player, people pay attention to what you do."

Explaining why Jews fascinate newspapers, Goldstein said the media tend to divide the world into oppressors and oppressed, victims and victimizers, and haves and have nots.

"The media regard Jews as on both sides. They are seen as victims of the Holocaust and anti-Semitism, but in Israel Jews are viewed as oppressors."

Goldstein, who joined the Sun as a general assignment reporter in 1978, said his paper is "a friend of Israel," and that this is a policy he picked up from his predecessor, John Downing.

David fighting Goliath

Criticism of Israel by the media is the price Israel pays for being a democracy and letting journalists into the country, "while in other countries, they would have their heads chopped off," Goldstein said.

The perception of Israel by the media has shifted, so that instead of David fighting Goliath, Israel is now Goliath, he added.

A report on Jews in Germany was given by Nathan Kalmanowicz, finance and religious affairs officer of the Central Union of German Jews. Though there were only 20,000 Jews in Germany 10 years ago, there are now 80,000, thanks to an influx of Russian Jews, he said.

Another 25,000 Ukrainian Jews have obtained visas for Germany, and the community is expected to grown even more, although "we know the best plan for them would be to go to Israel or the United States," he said.

Less than one percent of the Jewish population in Germany is German-born, said Kalmanowicz, who hails from Lodz, Poland. About 10 percent of the Jews come from Israel.

Out of 6,000 Jews in Munich, his home city, only 30 to 40 families keep kosher and about 10 per cent go to shul regularly. Only one percent of the Jewish population could be classified as haredim, he said.

Jewish consciousness is quite evident, he said, because 90 percent of German Jews visit Israel once a year and some go two or thee times in a year.

Keith Landy, head of the region chaired the meeting.

Polish paper apologizes for anti-Semitic article

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Accused Jews of treachery, greed and of collaborating with Nazis

TORONTO — A Polish-language newspaper has agreed to retract and apologize for a two-part article that employed classic anti-Semitic themes, and accused Jews of treachery, greed and of collaborating with the Nazis to kill other Jews.

Gazeta publisher Zbigniew Belz will publish a retraction, and apologize to the Jewish community in an upcoming edition, said Andrew Kumor, the paper's news editor.

"It was a mistake to publish the articles, but we would like more clearly defined guidelines on anti-Semitism," Kumor said. "Too often, people accuse other people of anti-Semitism. That brings the Holocaust to the back of the mind. This has to be exactly defined, what could be discussed or not."

The article, 42 pages long in translation, appeared in the Christmas and New Year editions of the Gazeta.

Written by Father Jan Kurdybelski, an occasional contributor to the paper, who lives in Poland, it traces Jewish history from the dawn of the Talmudic era to modern times.

Kurdybelski calls the Jewish holy book a "source of fanaticism" – one of the article's milder attacks.

He quotes various anti-Semitic sources to show that "Bolshevism is a Jewish creation;" that "the Jewish nation, perfidious and hated by God...is corrupt in mind and hardhearted, and their sole aim is to ruin and destroy the property and goods of Christians;" that "the Jews served the Russian armies as informers and betrayers;" that the talmudic "tractate Baba Batva teaches how to swindle Christians in trade ...and swindling them is not a sin but a virtue and a merit."

Kurdybelski also claims that the Jews of the Warsaw Ghetto collaborated with the Nazis and that "Jews were no more compassionate that the Germans."

"This article certainly promotes hatred of an identifiable group," said Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region.

Congress raised its concerns at a meeting with the Gazeta's management after being informed of an anti-Semitic article in the paper by The CJN. The CJN had been alerted to the article by a concerned reader but did not have the resources to translate it.

"They've agreed the apology will follow [the format] of a Press Council complaint, with a flash on page 1 and the substance of the apology inside," Landy said.

Kumor said the Gazeta often "discusses Polish-Jewish relations, and this was just one article on that. This was supposed to be on the Polish perception of the Jewish community throughout history."

While acknowledging that "we maybe did not realize the issue is so sensitive for the Jewish community," Kumor claimed that similar opinions about the Jews have been expressed by an Israeli writer. "I don't share those views, but the point is, that this in just a voice in the debate."

As to whether the article was "unadulterated anti-Semitism," as Landy has charged, Kumor said "I'm not sure I'm the right person to talk to. It was a kind of provocative thing to publish. It is a reflection of the Polish community's view of the Jewish community, which in history was anti-Semitic."

Ala Gettlich, a member of the Polish community who attended the meeting, said she felt "embarrassed and angry" when she read the articles. "There are still people who haven't learned the lessons of history and until they do, there is a danger that such views will take support," she said.

"As a Christian," she continued, "I'm offended that another Christian would use a holy book of another religion to attack that nation."

Gettlich said the Gazeta should have published an editorial explaining that the article was an example of some Poles' views of the Jews but that the newspaper didn't endorse it.

The Gazeta had published previous articles on Polish-Jewish relations and the paper "wanted to show this side of the debate," she said.

"More discussions are needed between the communities to foster a better understanding," Gettlich said. Congress is lacking "an appreciation of the nature of various immigrant groups," she added.

Belz, who approved the articles, and Kumor, are recent immigrants. Both had been jailed in Poland for articles they had written. "They approach freedom of the press differently than us. To say you should use self-censorship is offensive [to them]. I think they need more time in Canada to understand that," Gettlich said.

Landy rejected suggestions the issues were of debatable historical importance.

"It was unbridled anti-Semitism of the worst kind. To suggest it was in the realm of legitimate debate is not a maintainable position." Landy acknowledged that during Congress' meeting with the Gazeta, "Kumor wanted to get into a discussion on the merits of raising questions of historical interest."

But, "Canadian papers like Gazeta that have a wide distribution should be held to a standard that is acceptable to Canadians," he said.

The Gazeta is published five times a week, with an average daily circulation of 3,500-4,000, reaching 10,000 readers on the weekend.

Dry Bones
WHEN AMERICA LEFT VIETNAM THEY ABANDONED THOUSANDS OF THEIR VIETNAMESE FRIENDS BEHIND ENEMY LINES
BUT WHEN ISRAEL LEAVES THE SOUTH OF LEBANON WE WON'T DO THAT!
NO?
ABSOLUTELY NOT!
THERE ARE NO VIETNAMESE IN SOUTH LEBANON.

Steering clear of the brink

While the political leaders of Israel are travelling throughout the country campaigning for votes for the May 17 election, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat is conducting his own campaign among as many foreign leaders as will hear him, seeking support for his intention to declare independence for a Palestinian state. Arafat says that he already has assurances from the "non-aligned" states (whatever that means now, after the collapse of the Soviet Union almost a decade ago) and the Arab states, that they will recognize a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Of late, Arafat has had a very busy schedule travelling to Washington, the Vatican, Holland and most recently Greece, trying to gauge, if not drum up support for a possible unilateral declaration of independence after May 4, the date on which the Oslo Accords were to have been finally completed and implemented.

In most government capitals, he has succeeded in securing support for Palestinian statehood, but not for a unilateral declaration of such. Indeed, the U.S. Congress passed a resolution last week warning Arafat not to declare his state unilaterally.

Israel too, has warned him. The consequences of a unilateral declaration would be dire. The political aspirations of the Palestinian people would be set back, perhaps irremediably; but far worse, would be the violence and bloodshed that would surely accompany such a precipitous act.

In typically hyperbolic and inflammatory language, he issued a statement last week saying he was consulting with world leaders "in a race against time" to reach a decision by May 4. And in his trademark manner of factually and morally inverting the truth, he called upon the international community to save the peace process before things were pushed "to the brink of explosion."

Arafat is due to visit Canada very soon in what has been described by Canadian diplomats as a low-key working session with senior Canadian officials. We urge the government to impress its view on the Palestinian leader that a unilateral declaration would be disastrous for his people and for the entire region.

Arafat alone controls whether the peace process is pushed "to the brink of explosion." The Canadian government has an opportunity to help steer the process away from that fiery edge.

Halt the aggression

As these words are being written, the Yugoslav army of Slobodan Milosevic has once again resumed its military offensive against the villages and communities of Kosovo. With the departure last week of some 1,300 foreign monitors from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the collapse of the peace talks, many observers feel that Milosevic has given the orders to "finish the job" against the ethnic Albanian province.

Of course, what most people fear is that "finishing the job" means resuming a process of slaughter and "ethnic cleansing" against the Kosovans. The west cannot and must not allow this to happen.

If NATO air strikes are necessary to deter Milosevic from "finishing the job," they must be launched without hesitation after American envoy Richard Holbrooke attempts, yet again, to bring a halt to the Yugoslav aggression against the Kosovans. We urge the government of Canada to lend its voice to the rising, urgent western chorus approving reasonable, military means to try to save the people of Kosovo, whose lives have apparently been targeted for extinction by the president of Yugoslavia.

Induction oath in IDF had different meaning

Re the article (CJN, March 4), by Rabbi Yehiel Ben Ayon about the induction of the IDF soldiers in the Kotel.

Although the article was well written and inspiring, I was surprised by the lack of knowledge of the Hebrew language displayed by the author and the editorial staff of The CJN.

I have served as a soldier in the Israeli military in active combat duty. I can, in fact, tell you that the induction of my comrades and I after boot camp, was one of the most uplifiting events in my life – a lifetime opportunity that I would cherish for the rest of my life. The highlights of the induction is the military oath "ani nishba," I swear. As a sign of respect to the Orthodox soldiers who cannot say these actual words, their induction includes the words "ani matzhir," I declare.

At no point during the induction do the soldiers utter the words "ani mashbiah," which in English would mean something like, I praise, glorify or make something or someone better. This is not what was meant by the soldiers who have been proudly saying these words in the past 50 years or more.

Again, I would like to say that I liked the article and its content; however, seeing "ani mashbiah" in the title of the article has somewhat upset me.

Contrasts haredim and IDF positions on Israel

The haredi demonstration was certainly in stark contrast to the front page photo of the soldiers mourning their fallen officers and comrades (CJN March 4).

As well, the initiating ceremony at the Wall was gripping. As a former assault troop sergeant in the Canadian army, I can relate to these events as a part of the Jewish experience in Israel! What have the Haredim done to defend their homeland? They are exempted from military service.

I can appreciate people wanting to study the Talmud and the Torah, but in today's life that is not enough.

Especially in Israel, creative minds and work are absolutely necessary.

As a former president of Canadian Magen David Adom, I know the need for innovation and motivation. Let the Haredim give a little accommodation to those Israelis who believe in hard work and democracy no matter what their particular Jewish orientation may be!

Student conferences funded by federations

Thank you for The CJN commitment to Jewish campus life by your weekly On Campus features. Re: the article by Dave Gordon (Mar. 11), the conference in Calgary was the Western Regional Conference hosted by the University of Calgary Hillel and the Calgary Jewish community. This regional conference had student representation from Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver.

It is important to note that both the Atlantic and Western regional conferences were funded by UIA Federations Canada, its 10 federated community UJA campaigns, and the UIA campaigns in unfederated communities across the county. Local federations and UIA Federations Canada commit more than $1.2 million annually to support and develop Jewish campus services in over 20 communities.

Do you know these Jewish women writers?

I am seeking information on the following Jewish Canadian women writers, active during the first half of this century: Raisa Applebaum, Vi Berkowitz, Vera Black Slotkin, Arakie Cohen (née Ruth Jacobs), Malca Friedman, Ruby Friedman, Miriam (Mildred) Goldberg, Phyllis Kahan, Naomi Lenin, Freda Myron, Lena Newman, Sylvia Schwartz Raff, Regina Shoolman Slotkin, Hanna Tennenhaus, Ida Seigler Bension Wynne.

Please note that in some cases the spellings may be incorrect, and some names may have changed following marriage. Information on other Jewish women who published work in English before 1960 would also be welcome. Your assistance will help to prevent the accomplishments of these women from sliding into oblivion.

Heeding the imperative to unity

By MOSHE KAVEH

Passover is a family time, going right back to the first seder, when God commanded the Jews in Egypt to gather by clan and jointly partake of the paschal offering. Appreciation of freedom, and recognition of God's providence are the holiday's central themes, but unity of purpose and commitment to community are Passover motifs no less important.

If the Jews of Egypt had not been a relatively cohesive unit despite all of their differences, they would not have been able to pick up and leave en masse with relatively little notice.

How tragic then, that today's Jews ignore the imperative of unity, as our global Jewish society becomes increasingly vulgarized through unbridled, untamed confrontation.

Angry demonstrations deepen the fissures between secular and observant Jews in Israel. Ugly rhetoric between synagogue groups abroad, guts any sense of community. And on a personal level, Jews are quick to crudely label and stereotype one another – an illness born of ignorance and antagonism. No one has the patience to withhold judgment, out of what should be an abiding, overriding concern for klal Yisrael.

We are like two trains – religious and secular, Orthodox and Reform, Jewish and democratic – rushing headlong towards each other on a collision course.

Is such a catastrophic collision inevitable? I emphatically say no. Not if we – the moderates of the Jewish world from all parts of the religious and communal spectrum – seize centre stage and take control of the agenda.

I sense a profound hunger for new leadership that will boldly sweep aside the antagonisms, to work with ideological rivals in order to ensure a better Jewish future.

Nice words, but how?

To start with, it is easy to determine what not to do. Ultra-Orthodox leaders who publicly compare the Chief Justice of the Israeli Supreme Court to Haman, or invoke the Holocaust when talking about Reform Jews, are stomping into unacceptable rhetorical territory. Liberal Jews who speak of the Orthodox as medieval or uncultured, or who mock tradition and faith, err grievously as well.

As a devoutly Orthodox Jew who believes in synthesizing modernity and enlightened western values with tradition, I am appalled by the divisive invective that some religious leaders are hurling at fellow Jews in the name of our heritage. We must rein in the passions, and address difficult ideological matters with reasoned, intellectual debate.

But calling for more light and less heat is the easy part, and it is hardly enough to solve the challenges that confront Israel and the Jewish people. What we need is nothing less than an institutional revolution, one which produces new mechanisms for bringing people together, and then finds solutions to deep-seated problems of religion and state, religion and community. The old, existing institutions simply cannot solve these problems.

Thirteen judges on the Israeli Supreme Court, no matter how distinguished, are not the people who should be ruling on Who is a Jew? and what is an appropriate conversion to Judaism. The decisions of that court must be obeyed, because the rule of law is the hallmark of democracy and is necessary to prevent societal chaos. But right now, the court is ruling on spiritual matters by default because other Israeli institutions are unable to address them.

Nor should Israeli politicians in a deadlocked parliament be deciding on matters of synagogue and state. Israel is like an orchestra with very different instruments in different sections. To get elected, a typical political leader acts as if he or she is responsible for only one section; very few are committed to leading the entire orchestra and creating harmony.

The official Israeli rabbinate is dutybound to support and defend Jewish law, Halachah, by appropriate Orthodox standards. But the chief rabbis need to be more willing to seek solutions within Halachah that make room for Jews whose approach to Jewish law differs from the constituencies they represent.

The idea that Halachah is a rigid system subject only to the strictest, most narrow interpretations of the Torah is mistaken. Reputable Orthodox Torah scholars at Bar-Ilan University and other institutions have found, for example, halachic precedents for a somewhat less demanding conversion process, for more flexibility in judging requests for divorce, and for leniency on other issues now in contention. Acknowledging and furnishing adequate hearing to these views has been all too slow.

Similar criticism could be launched at the umbrella synagogue groups in North America, few of whom can honestly tell themselves that they have contributed to greater harmony, not discord.

So who will lead us out of the morass? The answer: Solutions will come from the next generation of leaders, from Israeli and Diaspora Jewish young men and women who are committed to Jewish unity, and who understand that rapprochement on many of our mutual problems – without abandoning one's principles – is not only possible, but essential.

I am enthusiastically optimistic because I know that, in Israel at least, a revolution is underway. There is a developing narrative of new-found dialogue and shared values in Israeli society.

Far from the Knesset and confrontational television broadcast studios, a populist revolution is blossoming. Thousands of people, in hundreds of organized and private frameworks, religious and secular, are studying Jewish tradition and culture together, yearning with palpable hunger for a new common ground, perhaps even a collective identity. There is no doubt in my mind that this is a phenomenon consequent upon Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's murder and its psychological impact on the Israeli public.

Take the Festival of Jewish Studies entitled Hachel that has taken place over the past two Sukkot holidays. Over 5,000 adults from across the political and religious spectrum participated in this eclectic, wonderful feast of Jewish lectures and open discussions on everything from religion and state, to art, chassidut and magic, women's readings of the Bible and the beauty of Halachah.

And believe it or not, all this was sponsored by the ardently secular United Kibbutz Movement, the traditional Bar-Ilan University (which I head), and two dozen other groups from the Yesha settlements, to the Reform movement – funded significantly by the Avi Chai Foundation. I have visited dozens of similar encounter groups for secular-religious dialogue, across the country.

At Bar-Ilan University, some of the country's most prominent pedagogues are working to bridge the divisions. The campus literally hums with the sound of dialogue. Leading academics from the school of education, the political science and philosophy departments, and the faculty of law, among others, are involved in a plethora of activities geared to improve relations between Israelis, and to fashion a new synthesis between Jewish and democratic values.

These activities include a novel educational program teaching Judaism and democracy as complementary values in 30 religious and secular high schools; on-campus seminars for teachers and educational administrators; and 40 student encounter groups exploring topics such as racism and prejudice, Jewish religion and identity, and Zionism and democracy. Over 1,000 young men and women of widely disparate backgrounds and beliefs participated in the program.

Prof. Moshe Kaveh

Our findings: Over the course of the programs, there is a big change in the attitudes of the participating teachers and students, who initially express great skepticism about the synthesis of the seemingly competing values being discussed and debated.

Our brief, then, is to analyze, describe and prescribe a new insight for contemporary Israeli/Jewish society – as a civil society, a Jewish community, a Jewish and democratic state, as one people. The way to start this is through dialogue.

Capping all this promising activity is the publication of a new Bar-Ilan University journal, called Democratic Culture. Law professor Yedidia Stern and philosophy professor Avi Sagi, the co-editors, seek to heighten awareness and deepen understanding in Israeli society at large of the complementary interface between democratic norms and Jewish values.

This activity constitutes the great hope for our fissured society. The grassroots is pulling back from the precipice of civil war, and seeking mutual understanding. That's the promising story of Israel today, which unfortunately you won't read about in the sensationalist Israeli media.

So I am optimistic. Bridging the gaps is possible if we provide frameworks for learning and dialogue. For the students who have never attended a synagogue, yet hunger for Jewish content and learning. For religious students who believe in democratic values and in working with non-observant peers to create a decent, just society.

Judaism is what must unite us – as a culture for secular Jews; as a way of life for religious Jews. We need not be on the same track religiously; but we must be headed in the same direction, towards a future in which our descendants will have enough in common and enough pride in their Jewishness so that our people remain intact.

But unfortunately, I do not see many moderate Jewish leaders who are willing to break the institutional mold, overcome narrow political or organizational considerations, and represent the majority of Israelis and Jews everywhere who are yearning for reconciliation and civility on religious issues. Now is the time to speak up!

In preparation for Passover, the legendary Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav composed the following prayer: "May it be your will, O Lord," he wrote, "that there be great affection and peace among all your people of Israel; that we should all be guided by brotherly love and compassion; that we should accept one another, and learn from one another; that we should appreciate all your living beings; and that the misfortune of one person should touch the hearts of all."

And on this Passover, let us say: Amen.

The voice of a compassionate man

The recent publication of a new biography of Primo Levi reawakens the memory of an unforgettable voice. Levi's clarity of prose, his calm and analytical style of writing, his scientist's eye, all give us a unique perspective on the Holocaust.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

His prose is full of questions. In his first book, Survival in Auschwitz, published in 1947 (recently renamed If This Be A Man), he asks gently: "In our days many men have lived in this manner, crushed against the bottom, but each for a relatively short period; so that we can perhaps ask ourselves if it is necessary or good to retain any memory of this exceptional human state. To this question we feel that we have to reply in the affirmative."

To Levi the lager (camp) was a reflection of the Inferno of Dante. But it was also a "gigantic biological and social experiment" which he was compelled to document. The scientist in him had to record the results of this horrific experiment, with its zones of black and grey. Worst of all there was "no why" there – no way to rationalize events, judgments, or outcomes. Each was dependent on whim.

In the lager he learned that mankind can be brutal and heedlessly arrogantly evil, and also that the human spirit can survive. But he never romanticized that will to live, and saw that sheer luck was the deciding factor. When he was free, his personal odyssey home (similar to that of Ulysses) gave him the opportunity to analyze others who had survived. In The Reawakening he describes with quiet humor the rigors of his return to normalcy, to a world where reason could be relied upon to answer "why."

That Levi was a great storyteller is evident in The Periodic Table, in which he likens the stories of his life before, during, and after the war to elements. Each element has its properties, just like the variety of human conditions.

Liberated by the realization that he can indeed fall in love, he feels "ready to enter life with joy and vigor...My very writing became a different adventure, no longer the dolorous itinerary of a convalescent ... but a lucid building, which was now no longer solitary; the work of a chemist who weighs and divides, measures and judges on the basis of assured proofs, and strives to answer questions."

He is now ready to "dredge up events from my memory and describe them with the greatest rigor and the least clutter." As he says simple, elsewhere, "I am of those people to whom many things are told."

That ability to tell and retell stories leads him to the one novel of the war which he wrote not from his own, but from others' experiences. If Not Now, When is a novel about partisan resistance based on stories he heard after returning to Italy.

His brief stint as an Italian partisan had ended in an almost comic rout of the fledgling band he joined as the Nazis closed in on his family after Germany occupied Italy in 1943.

It is in The Drowned and the Saved, a reflective book, that Levi , like Elie Wiesel, struggles to understand how the insanity of the Holocaust can be understood. But where Wiesel's stories grow longer, more mystical and fantastic, Levi's grow tauter, shorter, more succinct and emblematic.

Wiesel says, "There are things that happened that are not true; and things that are true, but did not happen." Levi struggles to understand how "what may not be, can be." Despite the assertion that "things whose existence is not morally permissible cannot exist", he knew they had existed "down there," and that millions of Europeans not only allowed them to exist but participated in those immoral deeds.

Finally he asks the question, how will we live, we at the century and the millennium's end? Do worse catastrophes await? He writes, "When it comes to the future, we are just as blind as our fathers...Why aren't we fleeing 'before'?"

Will this biography's new insights answer for us the question of why Levi died? Was the weight of his story in an increasingly disinterested world too much for him? No coward, he knew what life had been like "down there," how hard he fought to survive and how many all around him lost the will to survive.

All we have is his voice, the voice of a courageous and compassionate man who strove to understand humanity in all its elements.

An assault on democracy

The past few months have not been happy ones for our courts in general and the Supreme Court of Canada, in particular. They have been subjected to an unrelenting attack upon their decisions and, indeed, their very legitimacy.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Critics of the court argue that they are out of control and that the Charter of Rights is to blame.

This latest series of attacks on the court probably began with the Vriend case. The court decided that the Alberta human rights legislation should protect individuals from discrimination based upon sexual orientation.

Conservatives and religious fundamentalists vilified the court for its ruling.

The most recent provocation for the court-bashers was the Ewanchuk case – a case of sexual assault. The case – for those of you who have been visiting another planet – is quite straightforward: the defendant had touched the 17-year-old girl in a sexual manner in spite of being told No repeatedly by the complainant. No had never deterred the accused before.

You see, he had three previous convictions for rape and one for sexual assault. Nonetheless, the accused was acquitted by the trial judge because he found that the girl had "impliedly consented." The Alberta Court of Appeal affirmed the trial judgment. This, as Justice John Major pointed out in his Supreme Court judgment, was an error. There is either consent or there is not and there is no such thing as implied consent. In a concurring judgment, Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé, quite rightly, took Appeal Court Justice John McClung to task for his gratuitous and exceedingly insulting comments about the young girl and for the myths and stereotypes which lie at the heart of his comments.

McClung then wrote a letter to the National Post wherein he complained about L'Heureux-Dubé's judgment and noted that it was these type of judgments that were probably to blame for Quebec's high male suicide rate. (He, allegedly, did not know that L'Heureux-Dubé's husband had committed suicide some years ago.) He apologized to L'Heureux-Dubé but never to the young woman who was, through his comments, twice made a victim in the case.

McClung's judgment in the case was legally wrong; his extra-judicial comments were clearly inappropriate. He brought the justice system into disrepute. The Canadian Judicial Council must now deal with the matter.

The accusations levelled at the Supreme Court of Canada pale, however, in comparison to the vilification directed at the Supreme Court of Israel. One need only look to the recent haredi demonstration against the Israeli Supreme Court for confirmation of the virulent nature of the assault upon the court.

A quarter of a million haredim were marshalled from all areas of the country to protest the court's interpretation of the Basic Laws of the state. Placards read "The High Court Represents Violence" and "An End To Incitement (i.e. the incitement by the court)."

The invective, which leading haredi rabbis, including Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, directed at the court and Chief Justice Aharon Barak, was even worse and should not be repeated. Both current chief rabbis – Rabbi Yisrael Lau and Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron – attended the demonstration against the court even though they are employees of the state and supposedly non-political. It is, of course, our right in a free and democratic society, to criticize any of our governmental institutions including the courts and their decisions.

But there is a fine line between criticizing the decisions of the courts and questioning their legitimacy. The line is crossed when the critics do not recognize the rule of law. These are the facts of our legal system and, indeed, of our democratic system: the Constitution is the supreme law of Canada and the charter is part of the Canadian Constitution.

The Israeli Basic Laws on human dignity and liberty and freedom of occupation are superior to all other law. When judges interpret the constitution or the Basic Laws (or any other law), they are fulfilling the role that was given to them in our constitutional system – to uphold the rule of law. Those who attack the legitimacy of the court, on the other hand, are undermining the rule of law and democracy itself.

These challenges to the court are, to cite Barak, an assault "on democracy, in the true meaning of the term democracy. These arguments endanger not only the court but the very character of Israel [and Canada] as a land of law, which defends the rights of the minority and every individual." Those who attack the court should be cautious, always ensuring that, in their criticism of the court, they recognize and support the rule of law rather than undermine it.

A memory rediscovered

No, this column does not deal with an embattled aspect of psychiatry. It reprints a notation I had made many years ago. The event it describes took place a week before Pesach in 1945.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

We had been fighting on German soil for almost half a year, and had not met a single Jew who had survived the carnage. But then, between Aachen and the Rhine, Jewish settlements had not been too numerous. Would Cologne be different? It had harbored one of the oldest Jewish communities, whose origins went back to Roman times. Would there be survivors?

We had hardly entered the city when the first civilians approached us. "Are you really Jews?" they asked. When we assured them that we were, wildly gesticulating men and women surrounded us. There were tears, there was joy, there were the first tales of how they had survived: by hiding with Christian friends, by using false names, but mostly because they were only partially Jewish, and Adolf Eichmann had not gotten around to putting them on his special trains. There were also the first bitter inquiries after relatives who had been shipped away.

Looking back, I think we were too overwhelmed to grasp the full significance of it all. That came later, when we liberated the first concentration camp at Nordhausen.

We went to Roon Street Synagogue. There it was, almost as I remembered it in my youth! The strong outlines of the Byzantine structure, the solid walls, quite unimpaired. But inside, a gaping hole left from the raging fires of hatred. The beams were still scarred, the ashes still grey with accusation.

We stoked through the ashes. A half-burned leaf of a prayer book came in view and crumbled as soon as I touched it. My foot struck a piece of wood. It was one of the lions from the top of the Ark, its paw still raised as if to uphold the commandments. It was not burned but clearly broken off, testimony to someone's savagery. I lifted the carving tenderly, and I would always cherish it.

Curious citizens, Jews and non-Jews, came and watched silently. We told them that the next afternoon we would hold a service amid the ruins. The people spread the news.

Thursday, March 22, marked an unforgettable experience. Ragged, half-starved Jews, their spirits barely rekindled, stood next to their more fortunate co-religionists from America. A women pointed to the place where the bimah had been. "My son had his bar mitzvah here," she said. "Where is he now?"

We all cried unashamedly, battle-hardened soldiers along with the pitiful remnants of Cologne's great Jewish community. We sang with a fervor which seemed to wring an amen from the empty walls. The first synagogue service in Germany since 1938!

All of us were swept up in an immense wave of gratitude that the reign of evil was coming to an end and that even in the land of terror, the spirit of the Eternal People would not be quenched forever.

The Kirshner File

Portrait of a great magazine editor

William Shawn was an institution at The New Yorker, whose glossy pages have been graced by the likes of John O'Hara, E.B. White, John Updike and Truman Capote, among others.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As editor of the magazine from 1952 to 1987, Shawn wielded enormous power, and was judged to be one of the most influential figures in American letters. But for all his clout, he was intensely private and remote, eschewing the allure of celebrity.

The antithesis of the glamorous Tina Brown, one of his successors who recently resigned, Shawn was a publicity-shy man who was averse to "buzz" and who poured all his energies into building and consolidating a magazine famous for its crystalline short stories, perceptive essays and sardonic cartoons.

Eight years after Shawn's death, two of his former colleagues have written pungent memoirs about his life and his work. They are Here But Not Here (Random House) by Lillian Ross and Remembering Mr. Shawn's New Yorker (The Overlook Press) by Ved Mehta. Both books reveal important facets of his personality, but they are not biographies. In the end, they do not take his full measure, and Shawn remains somewhat shadowy and elusive.

Like Shawn, her lover for more than 40 years, Ross is a secular and assimilated Jew. "Both Bill and I," she explains, "felt Jewish, especially when it came to humor, but we didn't think in terms of Jewishness for our identity. Both of us seemed to be comfortable with the heritage without any formality over it."

She met Shawn, who was almost twice her age, several years before he took over the editorship from the legendary Harold Ross (no relation). At the time, Shawn was married and had three children. The affair was known to all, including his wife and colleagues at The New Yorker.

According to Ross' account, they had a wonderful relationship, and were "collaborators, partners and friends, both personally and professionally." She never felt like "the other woman," and Shawn repeatedly told her that he considered her his wife.

Given the fact that she was a smart and accomplished woman, it is remarkable that Ross tolerated such an arrangement for so long. Evidently, she was content with being his mistress. "Our lives were joined," she observes at one juncture. Elsewhere, she rhapsodizes: "We couldn't get enough of each other. Our love never became stale."

The story of their friendship, which is thankfully devoid of prurient details, is interesting to a point. But as I ploughed through Here But Not Here, a reference to his barren marriage, I found myself far more drawn to her portrait of Shawn, the dedicated and discriminating editor.

Shawn, she discloses, was an individual whose creative gifts were obscured and thwarted by his success. Eternally obligated to his writers, he felt imprisoned by his job, which he described as "the ultimate cell."

Working with speed, courtesy and concentration, he accommodated himself to their vocabularies, to their rhythms and to their endless needs. Shawn was usually able to reject unsatisfactory writing. But such was his solicitude that, once in a while, he bought a piece so as not to hurt the feelings of an author.

Reticent though he may have been, Shawn was supremely confident in his abilities. In 1961, to his dismay, the editors in the fiction department rejected Zooey, a short story by J.D. Salinger. To his ever-lasting credit, he ignored their advice and published it, thereby enriching American literature.

Although he devoted days and nights to helping his writers and artists, he never encouraged them to delve into his own personal life. "His oldest friends somehow knew he had marked a line beyond which he did not wish them to step," Ross writes.

Among the writers he nurtured was Hannah Arendt, the German-born political scientist who, in 1963, produced a five-part series on the Eichmann trial that later became the controversial book Eichmann in Jerusalem.

As Ross tells it, the editing of Arendt's manuscript was unusually difficult because her often-cumbersome Germanic sentences had to be converted into understandable prose.
